To George, animae dimidium meae

Table of Contents

Preface 9

Introduction 11

Commentary 18

Testimonia 18

Play-titles and Fragments 20

Ἀθάμας (Athamas)
("Athamas") 20

Ἀκκώ (Accō)
("Accō") 30

Ἀλείπτρια (Aleiptria)
("The Anointress") 32

Ἀλκμαίων vel -έων (Alcmaiōn or Alcmeōn)
("Alcmaiōn" or "Alcmeōn") 35

Ἀμπελουργός (Ampelourgos)
("The Vinedresser") 38

Ἀμφικράτης (Amphicratēs)
("Amphicratēs") 48

Βαλανεῖον (Balaneion)
("The Bathhouse") 56

Γυναικοκρατία (Gynaikokratia)
("Female Dominion") 61

Γυναικομανία (Gynaikomania)
("Madness for or of women") 66

Δακτύλιος (Daktylios)
("The Ring") 82

Δεξιδημίδης (Dexidēmidēs)
("Dexidēmidēs") 85

Διθύραμβος (Dithyrambos)
("The Dithyramb") 94

Ἑπτὰ ἐπὶ Θήβας (Hepta epi Thēbas)
("Seven against Thebes") 113

Ἔριθοι (Erithoi)
("The Day-Labourers") 119

Ἰάλεμος (Ialemos)
("Ialemos") 131

Καλλιστώ (Kallistō)
("Callisto") 145

Κονιατής (Koniatēs)
("The Plasterer") 147

Κουρίς (Kouris)
("The Maid-in-Waiting") 148

Κυβευταί (Kubeutai)
("The Dice-Players") 160

Λευκάς (Leukas)
("Leucas") 163

Ὀδυσσεύς (Odysseus)
("Odysseus") 170

[Ὀπώρα (Opōra)
("Opora")] 177

Οὐρανός (Ouranos)
("Uranus" or "Sky" / "Heaven") 179

Πάν (Pan)
("Pan") 185

Πλάνος (Planos)
("The Itinerant Showman") 190

Σαπφώ (Sapphō)
("Sappho") 207

Φιλάδελφοι (Philadelphoi)
("The Loving Siblings") 210

Φιλέταιρος (Philetairos)
("Philetaerus" or "The Man fond of his Comrade(s)") 223

Incertarum fabularum fragmenta 230

Bibliographical abbreviations 275

Bibliography 277

Indices 297

Preface

Methodologically, my approach to Amphis' surviving material features a tripartite structure: (i) analysis of each play-title, (ii) contextualisation and interpretation of each fragment, (iii) commentary on individual words, terms, and expressions. In stages (i) and (ii) I take into consideration all major literary parallels, antecedents, and subsequent occurrences of motifs, themes, and patterns. I use this method not only to highlight the coherence and continuity of Greek literary tradition (comic and other), but also to produce a plausible reconstruction of both the play's plot and each fragment's (immediate) context (including speaker's identification, if possible). Although I am well aware of the opposite, more conservative, approach, which advises against any reconstruction attempt in the absence of solid and irrefutable evidence, I staunchly remain (as I have already confessed in detail elsewhere; 2008: 23–25, 2012–2013a: 165–166) a fervent partisan of scrutinising all implications, allusions, and data contained in a fragment and pursuing them to the furthest possible extent. Inconclusiveness lies at the heart of (comic) fragments and constitutes their defining attribute; yet, this should not prevent us from trying to understand them not in vacuo but as integral parts of a meaningful entity. Fragments resemble tiny pieces of a gigantic jigsaw and, mutatis mutandis, can only make sense if interpreted against the bigger picture, rather than as isolated units whose contribution towards a better understanding of the comic genre (or the entire Greek literature) ends at preserving a peculiar syntactic structure or a hapax term. Accordingly, on several occasions throughout the present commentary, I have consciously decided to take a leap of faith and suggest one or more possible reconstructions of the original context, knowing that I might prove wrong in case more papyri scraps are unearthed. But until this happens, I consider it a classical scholar's duty to try to make the most out of what presently exists, so that new paths of thought can open up and productive dialogue can be incited.

As far as the practical issues of abbreviations and translations are concerned, I follow the abbreviations used by the Liddell & Scott Greek-English Dictionary (ninth edition 1940, with supplement 1996), while for Greek and Latin texts I cite the English translations of the Loeb Classical Library series (slightly adapted on a few occasions).

Being a member of the KomFrag project has been an honour and a privilege for me. First and foremost, I would like to thank Professor Dr. Bernhard Zimmermann, not only for entrusting me with the fragments of Amphis, but most importantly for his quintessential encouragement and his genuine friendship. Many thanks are also due to all members of the Freiburg KomFrag team, who shared their ideas with me and provided me with valuable feedback.

For the funding of my research I am grateful to the Heidelberg Academy of Sciences, to Loeb Classical Library Foundation (for the generous fellowship I was awarded in 2013–2014), and also to Fulbright Foundation Greece, since much of my research on Amphis was carried out during the time I spent at Harvard University as a Fulbright Visiting Scholar (2014–2015). In relation to the latter, I am thankful to the overwhelmingly helpful staff of Harvard's Widener Library, and especially to the research librarian Steve Kuehler, who went the extra mile and helped me track down an old and poorly cited bibliographical item.

Heartfelt thanks are also due to my parents, for innumerable reasons… But, especially, I would like to thank my husband George, to whom I dedicate this book, on our ten-year wedding anniversary, for unconditionally supporting my passion for classics during all these years.

Athina Papachrysostomou
Patras, June 2016

Introduction

1. Name / Identity

The surviving data about Amphis is scarce. A brief lemma in Suda (T1) informs us about his profession as a comic playwright and his Athenian origin. Apart from Suda's testimony, the proper name Ἄμφις is otherwise unattested in Attica, bar a single Attic inscription of the fourth century BC (T2), which honours a person called Ἄνφις (sic) originating from the island of Andros (cf. PCG 2,213). Combining these two pieces of information, both Kirchner (PA 785 + add.) and Traill (PAA 126100, 126105) envisage the possibility of identifying Suda's comic poet with the Andrian citizen. This is a reasonable hypothesis; still, Ἄμφις can be a hypocoristic of Ἀμφικράτης, which is a common Attic name; see further discussion under T1 and T2.

Outside Attica the name Ἄμφις occurs in two inscriptions from the island of Tenos (which is adjacent to Andros), dating from the third century BC (LGPN 1,35).

2. Chronology / Career

All that can be said with certainty is that Amphis was a Middle Comedy playwright, who flourished during the first half of the fourth century BC and, possibly, during the third quarter of that century too; but no secure dates for his floruit can be established. We have good reason to believe that at least one of his plays was performed in southern Italy (cf. fr. 40 "Interpretation"). Pollux – indirectly – lists him among the Middle Comedy poets, when he says (7.17): ἀλείπτριαν εἰρήκασιν οἱ μέσοι κωμικοί … Ἄμφιδος δὲ καὶ δρᾶμα ἔστιν Ἀλείπτρια (the female term "anointress" was used by the Middle Comedy poets … and there is also a play by Amphis called "The Anointress"; cf. Nesselrath 1990: 59). Unfortunately, within the surviving evidence Amphis is nowhere recorded as being victorious in any dramatic festival. The only evidence on which we may cautiously rely for dating his career are the references he makes to certain well-known contemporary figures, such as the philosopher Plato and a number of hetairai. For example, Webster (1952: 17–18) favours a date in the 350s BC for the production of Amphis' Δεξιδημίδης on account of a reference to Plato; and Nesselrath (1990: 197) dates the play Κουρίς some time after the year 350 BC, on the basis of the references to numerous hetairai, such as the famous Phryne.

3. Tradition and Reception

From Amphis' dramatic production there survive twenty-six play-titles (plus two spurious: Callisto and Opora) and forty-nine fragments (fourteen of which are not assigned to any particular play). Amphis' work enjoyed a conspicuously wide circulation in later antiquity; it is especially noteworthy that he was known to and quoted by all major lexicographic authors. His major source is Athenaeus, who preserves twenty-nine of Amphis' fragments within his Deipnosophistae. Amphis' material is also preserved by Stobaeus, Pollux, Diogenes Laertius, the Antiatticist, Hesychius, Photius, Suda, Eustathius, Marcian of Heraclea, Hyginus, Aratus Latinus, as well as by ancient scholia (on Plato's Gorgias and Aratus' Phaenomena). The popularity of Amphis among lexicographers is to be interpreted as a sign of his overall unusual language; indeed, what survives of his work substantiates this impression; see below under "Language".

The case of Athenaeus is particularly outstanding, since his Deipnosophistae constitutes not only an invaluable source of Amphis' material, but also a vast pool of quotations from all literary genres; in most cases, Athenaeus is the only source for the texts he preserves. There has been much scholarly debate and controversy about Athenaeus' own sources, method(s) of quotation, technique of writing, and mode of compiling such a huge amount of heterogeneous material, as well as about his trustworthiness when he makes contextualising statements. Given that the majority of Amphis' fragments are preserved solely by Athenaeus, there is need of a synopsis of some key data about this Second Sophistic author. Athenaeus drew his origin from Naucratis, a city that, ever since its foundation by Miletus in the seventh century BC, had developed into a renowned place for Greek intellectuals, a major culture hot-spot, and ultimately a centre of an early panhellenism. Within such an environment it is only reasonable to assume that Athenaeus actually had first hand knowledge and easy access to the originals of most of the works from which he quotes. Similarly, during his stay at Rome, Athenaeus was able to make extensive use not only of the well-equipped public libraries (looked after by the emperors; cf. Reynolds & Wilson [3]1991: 23–25) but also of private ones, e. g. the library of Larensis, the host of the symposion described in Deipnosophistae (praised in the prologue, 1.3a). At both Naucratis and Rome, Athenaeus must have had access not only to texts from the classical period, but also to works of Alexandrian scholarship, including Callimachus' Pinakes. Yet, a caveat is required: first hand knowledge can never be a guarantee of consultation for the specific purpose of citation, especially since Athenaeus lived in a period when anthologies and compilations of excerpts were extremely popular and readily available. With all probability, Athenaeus followed a twofold strategy; while he directly excerpted material from original works, he also used various intermediary sources (e. g. previous collections, compilations, glossaries, compendia, etc.); of course, we cannot determine in any individual case whether the citation comes from a primary or a secondary source. One way or the other, Athenaeus gives us, in general, good reason to believe that he made every effort to assure the authenticity and correctness of his quotations. Regarding the manuscript tradition, codex Marcianus (A: Venetus Marcianus 447) is our most important witness, since it is the unique source for the unepitomized Athenaeus. It was written in the early tenth century AD, probably by John the Calligrapher; although several copies of it survive, none of them has any value whatsoever for the constitution of the text. The two main codices of Athenaeus' Epitome, C (Parisinus suppl. Gr. 841) and E (Laurentianus LX.2), are closely related; unfortunately, the tactic of the Epitome compiler was to remove the majority of the titles of the works that were cited (hence the huge number of incertarum fabularum fragmenta – in the case of Amphis as well as in the case of other dramatic poets). See further the collective volume Athenaeus and His World, edited by Braund & Wilkins (2000), which focuses on multiple aspects of Athenaeus' life and work (including an analysis of issues of his manuscript tradition, in the chapter by Arnott); see also Lukinowich 1994.

Regarding the manuscript tradition of Stobaeus, the codices that preserve Amphis' material are S (Vindobonensis Sambuci), M (Mendozae Escurialensis), A (Parisinus), L (Laurentianus Florentinus), and Br (Bruxellensis). Noteworthy is also the personal anthology of Macarius Chrysocephalus, who was Metropolite of Philadelphia during the fourteenth century AD. For the compilation of his anthology Macarius drew extensively on Stobaeus' material. See Hense (1894) vol. III pp. vii-lxvii, xxxx, and Wachsmuth (1884) vol. I pp. xxx-xxxi.

Pollux is another major source for Amphis; the codices that preserve Amphis' material are A (Parisinus Gr. 2670), the kindred codices F (Falcoburgianus Parisinus Gr. 2646) and S (Schottianus Salmanticensis Hispan. I 2. 3), as well as the kindred codices B (Parisinus Gr. 2647) and C (Palatinus Heidelbergensis 375). See further Bethe vol. I (1900) i-xx.

The manuscript tradition of Diogenes Laertius is discussed by Marcovich in the introduction to his edition of the text (vol. 1, 1999, ix-xviii); the codices that preserve Amphis' material are B (Neapolitanus Burbonicus), F (Laurentianus 69,13), P (Parisinus gr. 1759), and the fragmentary codices V (Vaticanus gr. 1302) and Φ (an excerpt in Vaticanus gr. 96, with multiple apographa). Marcovich considers codex B to be the best (despite being written by an illiterate scribe), and codex P as similarly excellent (p. xii); but he considers codex F as inferior, written by a neglectful scribe (p. xiv).

4. Themes and Motifs

Seven of Amphis' play-titles suggest a mythological theme, either explicitly or implicitly so; these are: Ἀθάμας, Ἀλκμαίων, Ἑπτὰ ἐπὶ Θήβας, Ἰάλεμος, Ὀδυσσεύς, Οὐρανός, and Πάν. Amphis also dealt with two constellation myths, the Great Bear (Ursa Major) and the Dog-Star (Canis Major), and experimented resourcefully with the former myth, although we do not know in which play(s) this happened. The spurious cases of [Καλλιστώ] and [Ὀπώρα] have long been considered the plays that respectively accommodated these myths. However, as I explain in the commentary for each individual case, these two are made-up plays, falsely attributed to Amphis.

Regarding myth in general, it is the current scholarly belief that in Middle Comedy myth and contemporary reality are inextricably intertwined. Typically, plays that engage in mythological parody are dramatically situated in a distinct realm, in-between the mythical world and the contemporary reality of fourth century Athens. The traditional myth is comically distorted and accordingly presented in an adapted version that abounds in comic burlesque, twists, and unexpected turns; see Webster ([2]1970) 16–19, 82–85; Nesselrath (1990) 188–241, and 1995; Papachrysostomou (forthcoming). This idiosyncratic treatment of myth by Middle Comedy playwrights has its origins in Old Comedy's extensive (intertextual, satirical, etc.) engagement with the mythical tradition; cf. e. g. Bakola (2010) 180–208; Bowie 2010; Ruffell (2011) 314–360. The surviving evidence from Amphis both harmonises with and reinforces the universally adopted view regarding Middle Comedy's relation with myth. We have no means of knowing the details of the absurd twist that Amphis gave the myth in each case, but Aristotle feeds our imagination by giving us an example of the extent that distortion of myth could generally take in Comedy (Po. 1453ᵃ37–39): οἳ ἂν ἔχθιστοι ὦσιν ἐν τῷ μύθῳ, οἷον Ὀρέστης καὶ Αἴγισθος, φίλοι γενόμενοι ἐπὶ τελευτῆς ἐξέρχονται, καὶ ἀποθνῄσκει οὐδεὶς ὑπ' οὐδενός (those who are the worst enemies in myth, like Orestes and Aegisthus, leave the stage at the end having become friends and no one is killed by anyone). Aristotle's testimony confirms that practically any preposterous scenario could be realised on the comic stage; this is what Webster (1948: 23) called "comic reversal of tradition". Interestingly, scenes of astonishing mythical burlesque feature on a number of vases from South Italy dating in the fourth century BC; see Trendall ([2]1967) 54–55 no. 86, Trendall & Webster (1971) iv.30, Webster & Green ([3]1978) 135, Taplin (1993) 79–88.

Besides myth, manual professions also attracted the interest of Amphis, as one can deduce from the fact that there is a distinct category of banausic play-titles: Ἀλείπτρια (The Anointress), Ἀμπελουργός (The Vinedresser), Ἔριθοι (The Day-Labourers), Κονιατής (The Plasterer), and Κουρίς (The Maid-in-Waiting). A reasonable assumption is that these five plays largely reflected contemporary daily life.

A major comic trend that intermittently emerges in Amphis' corpus is the comic utopia (featuring ample and continuous provision of goods, ἀγαθά, and automation). Although this trend is unattested outside Old Comedy, manifestations of it are detected in four fragments of Amphis: frr. 9, 28, 38 and 43. See the analysis of each fragment, and especially fr. 28 ("Interpretation").

5. Kōmōdoumenoi

i) The philosopher Plato is mentioned twice: fr. 6 (Ἀμφικράτης) and fr. 13 (Δεξιδημίδης).
ii) The hetairai Sinope, Lyca, and Nannion are mentioned once: fr. 23 (Κουρίς).
iii) The hetaira Phryne is mentioned once: fr. 24 (Κουρίς).

6. Language

In general, Amphis exhibits a penchant for the unusual. To begin with, his surviving corpus features a total of ten hapax terms[1]: (i) the noun ὀλβιογάστωρ (one who finds bliss in eating, a belly-god; fr. 10.2: ὀλβιογάστωρ), (ii) the verb εὐκυβέω (be lucky with the dice; fr. 11: εὐκυβεῖν), (iii) the verb ἀνατριαινόω (to shake as if with a trident; fr. 14.8: ἀνατριαινώσει), (iv) the adjective ῥαχιστός (split into two; fr. 16.1: ῥαχιστά), (v) the noun σκιραφευτής (dice-player; fr. 25: σκιραφευτήν), (vi) the noun μίνδαξ (a kind of incense; fr. 27.3: μίνδακα), (vii) the diminutive γλαυκινίδιον (tiny glaukos-fish; fr. 35.2: γλαυκινιδίου), (viii) the adjective διαπαρθένιος (deflowering; fr. 48: διαπαρθένια δῶρα), (ix) the adjective παράκομος (with flowing hair; fr. 49: παρακόμους), and (x) the play-title

[1] I use the notion of "hapax" in its wider sense, applying it also to those cases where terms coined and first used by Amphis feature in later lexicographic sources (e.g. Pollux, Hesychius, etc.) as lemmata that are being interpreted.

Δεξιδημίδης (Dexidēmidēs; meant as a proper name). All these – apart perhaps from μίνδαξ – are probably Amphis' own coinages. There is also a notional hapax: ὁ πατὴρ τοῦ ζῆν (the father of life; fr. 17.2), a conception that is entirely Amphis' own resourceful creation. In addition, Amphis fr. 38.1 features a hapax occurrence of the noun συκάμινος (mulberry tree) in the masculine gender (instead of feminine), while Amphis fr. 29 features the only in-context occurrence of the term ἀτελής bearing the specific meaning of inexpensive. Further conspicuous instances of Amphis' dexterous use of language include the usage of the rare terms περιθέτη (wig; fr. 2) and μετάκερας (intermixed; fr. 7), as well as an imaginative metaphor in fr. 3, featuring the personified mind, safe on the vessel of knowledge, sailing past misfortunes.

7. Metre

In all but two of his surviving fragments Amphis employs the iambic trimeter; and he does so with a remarkably high rate of resolution: in the surviving total of his one hundred and twenty-three iambic trimeter lines, he practises resolution (of ancipitia, longa, and brevia) ninety-seven times, often twice within the same line. The penthemimeral caesura features more often than the hephthemimeral one. There are also several instances of triemimeral caesura (frr. 6.3, 9.5, 17.3, 26.3, 27.1, 34.1–2, 36.1), and two instances of middle caesura (fr. 13.3 and fr. 14.7).

The trochaic tetrameter catalectic is used in Amphis fr. 7 and fr. 8; the reason is probably the speaker's heightened emotional state; see comm. ad loc.

8. Amphis and other comic poets

As mentioned above (Intro. 2), there is no surviving record of Amphis being victorious in any dramatic festival; and this complicates the case for his own dating as well as for determining his contemporaries. Yet, there is an intriguing thematic convergence between Amphis and Alexis; in total there are nine shared play-titles between these two comic playwrights: Ἀλείπτρια (though this is possibly a false attribution to Alexis; cf. Arnott 1996: 813–817), Ἀμπελουργός, Γυναικοκρατία, Δακτύλιος, Ἑπτὰ ἐπὶ Θήβας, Κονιατής, Κουρίς, Κυβευταί, and Ἔριθοι. Additionally, Amphis fr. 30 (from the play Πλάνος) features salient and intriguing similarities with Alex. fr. 16. Kann (1909: 73–74) believes that Amphis regularly plagiarised Alexis; however, in the absence of all evidence it is hard to say who came first. Besides, Alexis was a younger contemporary of Amphis and his career extended well into the New Comedy era (cf. Arnott 1996: 18–25).

9. Literature

Orth, C., 2014. "Amphis", in B. Zimmermann & A. Rengakos (edd.), Handbuch der griechischen Literatur der Antike, 2. Band: Die Literatur der klassischen und hellenistischen Zeit, München, 1038–1040.

Papachrysostomou, A., 2008. Six Comic Poets. A Commentary on Selected Fragments of Middle Comedy, Tübingen, 30–100.

Papachrysostomou, A. (forthcoming). "Amphis", in The Wiley-Blackwell Encyclopedia of Greek Comedy (ed. by A. Sommerstein).

Commentary

Testimonia

test. 1

Sud. α 1760
Ἄμφις, κωμικός, Ἀθηναῖος.

Amphis, a comic playwright, an Athenian.

Suda[2] explicitly describes the comic poet Amphis as an Athenian; however, the name Ἄμφις is otherwise unattested in Attica (even outside Attica it occurs only twice, in two inscriptions from the island of Tenos; LGPN 1,35). Yet Suda's claim is probably to be taken seriously, particularly since the name Ἄμφις can be a hypocoristic form of Ἀμφικράτης (Kaibel, RE 1.2,1953–4, s. v. Amphis nr. 2),[3] which is widely attested in Attica (seven entries in PA and eleven entries in PAA), as well as elsewhere (fifteen entries in LGPN 1,34 from Delos, Euboea, Samos, and Thasos). See further Meineke 1,403f.

test. 2

IG II^3 347. 1, 11–22:
[ἐπὶ Ν]ικήτου ἄρχοντος
...
[ἐ]πειδὴ Ἄνφις Δι…
[… Ἄ]νδριος διατελεῖ ε[ὔνο]- [υς ὢν <ὢ]ν> τῶι δήμωι τῶι Ἀθ[ηνα]- [ίων κα]ὶ νῦν καὶ ἐν τῶ(ι) παρ[ελη]- [λυθό]τι χρόνωι, δεδόχθαι [τῶι] [δήμωι] ἐπαινέσαι Ἄνφιν [Δι.]

---

[2] Regarding Suda's entries on Attic comic poets in general see the discussion by Orth (2013) 18–20.

[3] One of Amphis' plays is entitled Ἀμφικράτης (Amphicratēs), a title that can be interpreted in various ways, one of which is to recognise the poet himself behind the title-figure; see comm. ad loc. The shortening of Amphicratēs to the hypocoristic Amphis is perhaps to be understood as a formation parallel to the case of the cognate names Τελεσικλής (Telesiklēs) and Τέλλις (Tellis), Archilochus' father and grandfather respectively.

..5.. Ἄνδριον καὶ cτεφ[ανῶ]- [cαι κι]ττοῦ [cτε]φάνωι ἀρ[ετῆ]- [c ἕνεκα καὶ δικ]αιοcύν[ηc· εἶ]- [ναι δὲ αὐτὸν πρ]όξενον [καὶ ε]- [ὐεργέτην τοῦ] δήμου τ[οῦ Ἀθη]
[ναίων]

In the archonship of Nikētes … because Anphis son of Di[– –] of Andros remains well-disposed towards the people of Athens both at present and in the past, the Popular Assembly has resolved to praise Anphis son of Di[– –] of Andros and to crown him with an ivy-wreath for his virtue and righteousness; and that he be a "proxenos" (public friend) and benefactor of the Athenian People.

This is an honourary decree issued by the Athenian Assembly. The mention (l. 1) of the eponymous archon (Nikētes) allows us to date it in the year 332/1 BC. Hereby the Athenian people bestow on a certain Anphis (with assimilation: Amphis) originating from the island of Andros the titles of proxenos ("public friend") and euergetes ("benefactor"). This act means that Amphis was appointed to represent Athens' interests (political and other) in his own community, i. e. the island of Andros. The very fact that he represents Athens' interests outside Athens speaks against the hypothesis that this person might be the same individual as the one mentioned by Suda (Test. 1) as an Athenian citizen. Besides, the bestowal of the titles of proxenos and euergetes does not entail the conferral of Athenian citizenship as well.

It is noteworthy that the phraseology πρόξενος καὶ εὐεργέτης τοῦ δήμου τοῦ Ἀθηναίων (ll. 20–22) experiences over time an increasingly frequent occurrence in the Attic inscriptions, and especially so during the second half of the fourth century BC (over twenty cases during the period 352–322 BC). For further discussion and detailed analysis of the twin offices of proxenos and euergetes see Walbank (1978) 2–30; Henry 1983; Marek 1984; Reiter (1991) 1–28, 313–334 (featuring a catalogue of all proxenos and euergetes cases in Athens during the fifth century BC); Ginestí Rosell 2013.

Play-titles and Fragments

Ἀθάμας (Athamas)
("Athamas")

Discussion Edmonds 2,312f.; PCG 2,213; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 293; Papachrysostomou 30–32

Title The title strongly suggests a mythological theme. Antiphanes also wrote a comic play entitled Ἀθάμας (PCG 2,318). But the mythological figure of Athamas was more popular among the tragic poets: Aeschylus (TrGF 3,123–125), Sophocles (Ἀθάμας α΄ et β΄, TrGF 4,99–102), and Astydamas (TrGF 1,200) produced tragedies called Ἀθάμας. Xenocles composed a homonymous satyr play (TrGF 1,153), whilst Euripides wrote a play entitled Ἰνώ (TrGF 5.1,442–455), after one of Athamas' wives. Later, the Roman tragic poets Ennius and Accius also wrote plays entitled Athamas.

Athamas was one of Aeolus' sons and ruler of Boeotia. He was best known for his three wives and his tragic fate, summed up in Sophocles fr. 4: ὡς ὢν ἄπαις τε κἀγύναιξ κἀνέστιος (how being childless, wifeless, and homeless). The tradition is not unanimous with regard to the details of his life and the order of his wives. The basic plotline unfolds as follows: Nephele bore to Athamas Phrixus and Helle, Themisto gave him Leucon, Erythrius, Schoeneus, and Ptous, and Ino gave him Learchus and Melicertes. But Ino mischievously plotted against the children of Nephele; she told the women of the community to parch the wheat seeds, so that no crops would grow. This forced Athamas to send for an oracle, whose response – forged by Ino who wished to see Nephele's children being killed – asked for the sacrificial killing of Phrixus and Helle. The imminent sacrifice was averted by Nephele's intervention, who supplied her children with a ram with a golden fleece that bore Phrixus and Helle away through the sky; an escape which ended with Helle drowning in the sea (later called the Hellespont) and Phrixus settling in the land of Colchis. Themisto was no less scheming than Ino; wishing to take vengeance on Ino, who had stolen her husband from her, she conspired to kill Ino's children; but by mistake she killed her own. Subsequently, Athamas, stricken by Hera's wrath, became insane and killed Learchus, whereas Ino and Melicertes cast themselves into the sea. The basic source is Apollod. 1.9.1–2, 3.4.3. See also D.S. 4.47; Paus. 1.44.7–10, 9.34.7, Zenob. Cent. 4.38, Tz. ad Lyc. 22; Ovid Met. 4.464–542, Hygin. Fab. 1–5; etc. Cf. Gantz (1993) 176–180, 183–184.

The myth allows for the possibility that Athamas' marital difficulties were important for the plot of Amphis' present play. The slyness of both Ino and Themisto and their scheming tricks and vile plans were probably the specific mythical elements that were mostly exploited for comic purposes by Amphis. If so, the preference for a hetaira over a wedded wife expressed in fr. 1 may reflect Athamas' comic escape from his conjugal troubles. Rather than being a passing reference, this penchant for hetairai may have formed part of an imagery of antagonism between hetairai and wives, which underpinned the play's plotline. Besides, the use of contemporary themes (like hetairai) within a play with a mythological plot is a typical feature of Middle Comedy; see Nesselrath (1990) 188–241, and 1995; Konstantakos 2014. Cf. Intro. 4 ("Themes & Motifs").

fr. 1 (1 K.)

εἶτ' οὐ γυναικός ἐστιν εὐνοϊκώτερον γαμετῆς ἑταίρα; πολύ γε καὶ μάλ' εἰκότως.
ἡ μὲν νόμῳ γὰρ καταφρονοῦσ' ἔνδον μένει, ἡ δ' οἶδεν ὅτι ἢ τοῖς τρόποις ὠνητέος
5 ἄνθρωπός ἐστιν ἢ πρὸς ἄλλον ἀπιτέον

1 εὐνοϊκώτερον Meineke: εὐνοικώτερον A, PCG: -τέρα CE 2 πολύ γε κ. μ. εἰκ. om. CE 4 οἶδεν ὅτι ἢ … ὠνητέος ACE: οἶδ' ὅτι ἤτοι … ὀνητέος Cobet 5 ἄνθρωπός ACE: ἄν- Meineke

And so, is not a hetaira more well-disposed than a wedded wife? Very much so and reasonably enough.
For a wife, even if she is disdainful, gets to stay in the house by custom, while a hetaira knows that she must either buy a man with her manners or go off to another one

Ath. 13.559a-b
Ἄμφις δ' ἐν Ἀθάμαντι (δ' ἐν Ἀθ. om. CE)· εἶτ' —— ἀπιτέον

And Amphis in "Athamas": "And ——another one"

Metre Iambic trimeter

1. ——⏑— ⏑|—⏑— ⏑⏑—⏑— (penthemimeral caesura)
2. ⏑⏑—⏑— —|⏑⏑⏑— ⏑—⏑— (penthemimeral caesura)
3. ——⏑— —|⏑⏑⏑— ——⏑— (penthemimeral caesura)

4. ––⏑⏑⏑ –|–⏑– ––⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
5. ––⏑– ⏑|–⏑– ⏑⏑–⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)

Discussion Meineke 3,301; Bothe 480; Kock 2,236; Edmonds 2,312f.; PCG 2,213f.; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 293; Papachrysostomou 32–35

Citation Context At the beginning of Book 13 Athenaeus announces his intention to discuss matters relating to love (τὸν περὶ ἐρωτικῶν λόγον; 13.555a-b). Within this context he studies both wedded wives and hetairai, quoting passages that make arguments for and against each group of women. At 13.558e the banqueter Leonidas launches an irate attack against married women (γαμετὴ γυνή), citing a series of comic fragments. Amphis' present fragment is preceded by Alex. fr. 150, Xenarch. fr. 14, and Philetaer. fr. 5; the latter also draws a comparison between hetairai and wives.

Constitution of Text The play's title is left out by Athenaeus' epitome codices C and E (cf. Intro. 3 "Tradition and Reception"). In l. 1 codices C and E preserve εὐνοικωτέρα, whereas codex Marcianus (A) preserves εὐνοικώτερον, which provides for a common syntactic pattern (adjective of neuter gender describing a male or female noun; cf. comm. s. v.). Kassel & Austin adopt A's reading; Meineke cared to add dialytics (εὐνοϊκώτερον). The second half of l. 2 (πολύ γε καὶ μάλ' εἰκότως) is left out in the epitome. In l. 4 Athenaeus' manuscript tradition unanimously preserves the phrase οἶδεν ὅτι ἢ τοῖς τρόποις ὠνητέος. Instead, Cobet (1858: 62) proposed the alternative reading οἶδ' ὅτι ἤτοι τοῖς τρόποις ὀνητέος; in this case the meaning would be that the hetaira must benefit a man with her manners. The concept is plausible and the line scans. However, the verbal adjective ὀνητέος has no parallels (though the adjective ὀνητός "beneficial" does occur – albeit sporadically); and, since the text preserved by the manuscript tradition poses no critical issues, no change is necessary.

In l. 5 Meineke proposed the reading ἅνθρωπός, i. e. with a rough breathing as a result of crasis of the noun ἄνθρωπός and the definite article ὁ. Though a possible reading, it is not necessary that we modify what the tradition unanimously preserves, since the transmitted text makes perfect sense as it is: the comic character does not refer to a specific occasion (in which case the definite article would be essential), but rather he speaks generally; cf. Kühner & Gerth ([4]1955) ii.1 §461.

Interpretation Thematically, the speaker touches on two topics of sensitive social and legal importance in ancient Athens: wives and hetairai. In so doing, he stylistically argues a paradox, i. e. that hetairai are more loving than wives. The speaker sounds sophisticated and learned. The language and style of the fragment are evocative of rhetoric; see further below and comm. svv. εἶτ' οὐ (l. 1) and ὠνητέος - ἀπιτέον (ll. 4–5).

The fragment reflects a social norm: the legal status of a wedded wife allows her to behave contemptuously towards her husband and still get away with it, i. e. retain her man. A wife does not need to make any extra effort to keep her husband and to constantly sustain his interest (sexual or other) with her deportment, in order to secure her position, since the legal sanction of the constitution of marriage does this for her. Interestingly, in real life the wife had some significant leverage at her disposal: she was allowed to divorce her husband, in which case (i. e. if she initiated the divorce process) he was required to return to her the dowry he had received upon marriage. But if the husband had spent the dowry, the only way to avoid bankruptcy was to maintain the favour of his wife – even if she happened to be disdainful; cf. Plu. 13f: οἵ γε μακρῷ κρείττους ἑαυτῶν λαμβάνοντες οὐ τῶν γυναικῶν ἄνδρες, τῶν δὲ προικῶν δοῦλοι λανθάνουσι γιγνόμενοι (men who marry women very much superior to themselves are not so truly husbands to their wives, as they are unawares made slaves to their dowries). But, of course, a husband was also allowed to divorce his wife on grounds of negligence, etc. For further discussion of the social, legal, and economic parameters that defined women's position in Athens (and beyond, throughout antiquity), see e. g. Thompson 1972; Dover (1974) 95–98, 209–213; Pomeroy (1975) 57–148; Reinsberg 1989; Schaps 1979; Gould 1980; Keuls (1985) 98–128; Winkler 1990; Cohen (1991) 70–170; Hunter (1994) 9–42; Blundell 1995; Brulé 2003.

On the other hand, a hetaira needs to secure/ensure/buy (ὠνητέος l. 4) with her behaviour every minute of her stay with her man, since her relationship is not legally sanctioned (though see Sealey 1984 for exceptions). As a result, a hetaira could often prove more loving and caring than a wife; cf. Keuls (1985) 267–273. Unlike a wedded wife, who can afford to be contemptuous on account of her largely invariable status, a hetaira is perfectly conscient of the fact that her status is not fixed (far from it), and that in order to prolong this relationship and avoid being sent away (πρὸς ἄλλον ἀπιτέον, l. 5), she must constantly be thoughtful and considerate, loving and affectionate, and continually try her best to please her man. Hence, a man who cohabits with a hetaira is to be considered more privileged than a husband; this (paradoxical) conclusion is exactly the point that the speaker so vigorously introduces with his initial tour de force (εἶτ' οὐ, l. 1). It is probable that the speaker refers to a case where a man is in a permanent relation with a hetaira and possibly (though not necessarily) cohabits with her, just as he would do with a wedded wife. This pattern was not unusual in real life; Antiphanes fr. 210 also refers to such a case of cohabitation of a man with a hetaira. Cf. the case of Menander's Samia, where Demeas sends away the hetaira Chrysis (with whom she cohabits) on grounds of alleged unfaithfulness, ll. 369–398 (this scene is depicted on a fourth-century AD mosaic from the "House of Menander" in Lesbos; see Charitonides-Kahil-Ginouvès 1970: 38–41, with pl. 4); esp. l. 385: ἑτέρα γὰρ ἀγαπήσει τὰ παρ' ἐμοί (another woman will love what I have to offer). See also Nikeratos' words in ll. 508–509: παλλακὴν δ' ἂν αὔριον / πρῶτος ἀνθρώπ[ω] ν ἐπώλουν (I'd be the first one to sell off the concubine the next morning).

Of course, there was a plethora of terms used to describe the various categories and statuses of hetairai: e. g. πόρνη (whore), παλλακή/παλλακίς (concubine), ἑταίρα (hetaira/courtesan), μεγαλόμισθος ἑταίρα (high-priced hetaira), etc.; cf. [D.] 59.122 (with Miner 2003). Yet, the use of the term ἑταίρα in the present fragment is not meant to pinpoint any particular group of hetairai, but rather indicate the essential differentiation between wives and all the rest of (sexually available) women. For further analysis of (various aspects of) the role of hetairai in Greek society (and Greek Comedy), see – from among the abundance of relevant treatises and studies – Hauschild 1933; Keuls (1985) esp. 153–186; Konstan 1987; Nesselrath (1990) 318–324; Davidson 1993 and (1997) 73–77; Kurke 1997; Faraone & McClure 2006; Henry 1985 and 2006; Auhagen 2009; Glazebrook & Henry 2011.

The concept that hetairai can be more affectionate than wives recurs in Philetaer. frr. 5 and 8. This preference towards hetairai (to the detriment of wives) originates from a combination of two comic trends: (i) praising and defending hetairai (limited to Middle and New Comedy); e. g. Antiph. fr. 210, Ephipp. fr. 6, Eub. fr. 41, Theophil. fr. 12; and (ii) castigating wedded wives (present throughout all comic eras); e. g. Ar. Pax 979–986, Id. Th. 476–489, Aristopho fr. 6, Eub. fr. 115, Men. frr. 119 and 236, etc. The latter trend constitutes the comic version of a widely established misogynistic pattern within the Greek literary tradition. A pronounced trend against women manifests itself as early as Hesiod; e. g. Th. 570–613, Op. 54–105. Semonides' caustic poem on women (fr. 7 West) is another major example of this attitude, cf. esp. ll. 96–97: Ζεὺς γὰρ μέγιστον τοῦτ' ἐποίησεν κακόν, / γυναῖκας (Zeus created the ultimate evil, women). See Gerber (1997) 72–78; Campbell ([2]1982) 187–191; Cantarella (1987) passim; Osborne (2001) 47–64. This pattern is also present in tragedy; e. g. E. Hipp. 616–668 (see Barrett 1978 ad loc.). For the reverse position see E. Med. 410–430; cf. Pomeroy (1975) 103–112.

But, contrary to Amphis' present fragment, hetairai are normally greedy and their affection is for hire; and this is exactly how they are stereotypically portrayed elsewhere in Comedy (apart from the few cases of praise recorded above); e. g. Amphis fr. 23, Alex. fr. 103, Anaxil. fr. 22, Theophil. fr. 11, Timocl. fr. 25, etc. This kind of reversal of normal perspectives is part of the sophistic tradition. There is a sub-genre of epideictic oratory devoted to praise of seemingly unpraiseworthy subjects, known as the paradoxical encomium, which is exemplified by Gorgias in Helen's Encomium. This arguing of a seemingly unwinnable case finds its way into Comedy with the speech of personified Penia in Aristophanes' Wealth 418–609 (see Kennedy 1963: 167–173; Papageorgiou 2000: 19–34, 196–205; Newiger 1957: 155–164), while the term παίγνιον (entertainment, diversion, amusement) is often applied to it; cf. Gorg. Hel. 21: ἐβουλήθην γράψαι τὸν λόγον Ἑλένης μὲν ἐγκώμιον, ἐμὸν δὲ παίγνιον (I wished to write this speech as an encomium for Helen and as a personal amusement; cf. Giombini 2012: 126, 142–144); [Demetr.] Eloc. 120: ἐγὼ δὲ Πολυκράτει μὲν τῷ ῥήτορι συγχωρῶ ἐγκωμιάζοντι … καὶ αὐτὸς τῆς γραφῆς ὁ ὄγκος παίγνιόν ἐστι (I for one acquiesce to the orator Polycrates composing encomia … for the lofty majesty of style is a form of entertainment in itself). In general, arguing either a paradox or the impossible was a particularly popular motif during the fourth century BC. This tendency is distinctively described in the prologue of Isocrates' Encomium of Helen (oratio no. 10) §1: εἰσί τινες οἳ μέγα φρονοῦσιν, ἢν ὑπόθεσιν ἄτοπον καὶ παράδοξον ποιησάμενοι περὶ ταύτης ἀνεκτῶς εἰπεῖν δυνηθῶσι (there are some who boast if, after setting up an absurd and paradoxical subject, they succeed in discussing it in a tolerable way). Such singularum rerum laudes (Cic. Brut. 47) include encomia of death by Alcidamas (Men. Rh. 3,346 Spengel), of the hetairai Nais and Lagis by Alcidamas and Cephalus respectively (Ath. 13.592c), of pebbles, cauldrons, and mice by Polycrates the Sophist (Alex. Rh. 3, 3 Spengel; cf. Chroust 1957: 254 n. 382; Nightingale 1995: 100–101), etc. This sub-genre of paradoxical encomia experiences a later reemergence during the Second Sophistic; cf. Lucian's Fly's Encomium.

Taking all the above into consideration, one can legitimately interpret this fragment as a comic exercise in rhetorical paradox, on the basis of its peculiarly strange argumentation that departs from and contradicts the commonly accepted norms of (social) behaviour. It is conceivable that Amphis consciously applied the language and posture of rhetoric to the dramatical content of his comedy, here and elsewhere in his work (cf. comm. on Amphis fr. 8).

1a εἶτ' οὐ The particle εἶτα is commonly used (in both poetry and prose) as a forceful way of introducing a question or an exclamation, which is meant to communicate some strong feeling, e. g. surprise, indignation, contempt, sarcasm, and the like (cf. LSJ[9] s. v. II). εἶτα can be followed by negation (as in the present fragment), especially in rhetorical texts, to add emphasis within an emotionally intense context; e. g. D. 1.24 (εἶτ' οὐκ αἰσχύνεσθε;), Id. 19.250 (εἶτ' οὐ σὺ σοφιστής;), Id. 23.61 (εἶτ' οὐ δεινόν, ὦ γῆ καὶ θεοί, καὶ φανερῶς παράνομον…), Id. 24.137 (εἶτ' οὐ καταγέλαστος δόξει ἡ πόλις εἶναι, εἰ τοῖς ἱεροσύλοις νόμον φανεῖται τιθεμένη;), Din. 1.53 (εἶτ' οὐ δεινόν, ὦ Ἀθηναῖοι, εἰ … ἴσχυσεν ἂν τὸ ψεῦδος τῆς ἀληθείας μᾶλλον); see also S. OC 418, Pl. Ap. 28b, Tht. 149a; Plu. 865b; Luc. Cat. 13, Lib. Decl. 12.31, etc.

It is noteworthy that in Comedy (especially – though not exclusively – during the Middle and New periods) this emotionally charged usage of εἶτα (and εἶτ' οὐ) occurs accumulatively and resembles the vehemence displayed in rhetorical speeches (cf. the aforementioned examples). Both the orators and the comic playwrights use this expression to capture and retain the audience's attention. Just as in the rhetorical texts, in several comic passages εἶτα is employed in order to introduce a strong rhetorical question that is expressed within an intensely emotional atmosphere – in the manner of a stylistic tour de force. Herewith the speaker usually embarks on a soliloquy, where he argues vigorously and passionately in favour of an opinion (which often features a certain degree of exaggeration) – in a way analogous to and reminiscent of the orators exposing the details of an argument or a situation; e. g. Men. Dysc. 153–154 εἶτ' οὐ μακάριος ἦν ὁ Περσεὺς κατὰ δύο / τρόπους ἐκεῖνος (was not that well-known Perseus blessed in two ways? – cf. Handley 1965: 158–159); Alex. fr. 44 εἶτ' οὐχ ἁπάντων ἐστὶ τὸ μεθύειν κακόν (is not then getting drunk the biggest evil of all? – cf. Arnott 1996: 154); Amphis fr. 17.1 εἶτ' οὐχὶ χρυσοῦν ἐστι πρᾶγμ' ἐρημία; (is not then solitude golden?) and fr. 36.1 εἶτα πρὸς θεῶν (so then, by the gods); Aristopho fr. 11.1–2 εἶτ' οὐ δικαίως ἔστ' ἀπεψηφισμένος / ὑπὸ τῶν θεῶν τῶν δώδεκ' εἰκότως <τ'> Ἔρως; (well, was not Eros rightly and reasonably disfranchised by the twelve gods?); Antiph. fr. 101.1–2 εἶτ' οὐ δικαίως εἰμὶ φιλογύνης ἐγὼ / καὶ τὰς ἑταίρας ἡδέως πάσας ἔχω; (so am I not right to love women and enjoy all hetairai?); cf. Antiph. fr. 157; Alex. fr. 145; Men. fr. 508.1 and Her. 7; etc. The pattern is also present in Aristophanes, e. g. Ach. 312, Nu. 860 and 1214, Ra. 21, fr. 102.1, etc.; cf. van Leeuwen (1898) 46 (on Ar. Nu. 226). Reinhardt (1974: 106–109) notes that not all the εἶτα-clauses are the same; e. g. in Amphis fr. 1 the speaker begins with a generic statement / a personal belief, whereas elsewhere (e. g. Men. Dysc. 153) the speaker sets off with a mythological example drawing on the sanction of the mythological tradition.

1b εὐνοϊκώτερον The neuter εὐνοϊκώτερον refers to the hetaira. The use of a neuter complement with masculine or feminine subject is common; cf. Kühner & Gerth ([4]1955) i.1 §96. The adjective εὐνοϊκός is unexpected when it comes to describing a hetaira. Hetairai can be many things, but are nowhere described as being εὐνοϊκαί (favourable, well-disposed). In fact, the adjectives εὐνοϊκός/εὔνους are generally atypical terms in a sexual context. Furthermore, this is the only instance of the term εὐνοϊκός within the comic register. Even outside Comedy the adjective εὐνοϊκός is very rarely used (in the fourth century it occurs only once: D. 57.1); instead, it is the adverb εὐνοϊκῶς that is preferred, in the expressions εὐνοϊκῶς ἔχειν τινί or πρὸς τινα, and the like; e. g. Isoc. 11.3, X. HG 4.4.15, D. 15.22.

1–2 γυναικός … γαμετῆς The presence of the adjective γαμετῆς makes clear that the woman (γυναικός) mentioned in l. 1 is married. The usage of hyperbaton enables the poet to juxtapose γαμετῆς with ἑταίρα at the beginning of l. 2, thus juxtaposing wives (along with the concept of marriage) with non-married, but still sexually active, women.

2 μάλ' εἰκότως This phrase confirms the validity of what has been said before. A brief justification of this validity often follows (as happens here: ll. 3–5). The phrase occurs in both poetry and prose and can appear either at the end of a period (e. g. Anaxipp. fr. 1.18; Plb. 10.33.3; Luc. Alex. 25) or in the middle (e. g. Pl. R. 414c, Plt. 270b; D. 18.16 – cf. Wankel 1976 ad loc.).

3a νόμῳ This is a modal / causal dative, meaning by custom. Within both poetry and prose the adverbial dative of the term νόμος is a relatively rare syntactic formula for communicating the meaning of by custom, by agreement, conventionally (a notion more commonly expressed through κατά + acc. or ἐν + dat.; cf. LSJ[9] s. v. I.c); e. g. Hdt. 4.39: λήγει δὲ αὕτη, οὐ λήγουσα εἰ μὴ νόμῳ, ἐς τὸν κόλπον τὸν Ἀράβιον (and this (sc. peninsula) ends – not truly but only by common consent – at the Arabian gulf); Democr.Phil. fr. 9: νόμῳ γλυκύ, νόμῳ πικρόν, νόμῳ θερμόν, νόμῳ ψυχρόν (by common agreement sweet and bitter, by common agreement hot and cold).

3b ἡ μὲν … καταφρονοῦσ' Nominative absolute featuring a concessive participle. The structure forms part of the comic παίγνιον that runs throughout the fragment, in the sense that the wedded wife (ἡ μέν), unlike the unattached hetaira (ἡ δ', l. 4), can – paradoxically enough – be disdainful to her husband and still retain him.

3c ἔνδον μένει A respectable and dignified wife was expected to stay indoors, inside the house, and away from the public eye; cf. E. fr. 521: ἔνδον μένουσαν τὴν γυναῖκ' εἶναι χρεών / ἐσθλήν, θύρασι δ' ἀξίαν τοῦ μηδενός (the dignified woman is supposed to stay indoors, but the worthless one stays outside); cf. E. Tr. 647–649. Indeed, in Aristophanes' Peace 979–982 it is precisely the adulteresses who are identified as the ones opening the door and mischievously peeping out: μὴ ποίει γε ἅπερ αἱ / μοιχευόμεναι δρῶσι γυναῖκες· / καὶ γὰρ ἐκεῖναι παρακλίνασαι / τῆς αὐλείας παρακύπτουσιν (don't act as adulterous wives do; they open the door a crack and peep out); on female adultery in classical Athens see Cohen 1990 and Carey 1995. The seclusion of wives at home – aiming to promote and safeguard the segregation of the sexes – was a primary feature within the system of male and female relations, at least for the propertied classes; cf. X. Oec. 7.30, Stob. 4.23.61, [D.] 59.122, Plu. 139c. See Headlam (1922) 31–32 (on Herod. 1.37), Pomeroy (1975) 79–84, Keuls (1985) 98–128. For a critique of the traditional view about women's seclusion see Cohen (1991) 133–170. Cf. "Interpretation" above for further bibliography on women.

Apart from the literal translation "to stay indoors", the expression ἔνδον μένει may also be interpreted as a notion opposite to ἀπιτέον, i. e. "to be present as a spouse" / "not to leave, not to dissolve the marriage". In this case, we have a behavioural antithesis (stay ≠ leave, presence ≠ absence) that complements the antithesis between the wife (who stays in the house and in the marriage with her husband) and the hetaira (who leaves the house and her lover).

4a τρόποις The term τρόπος (deriving from the verb τρέπω: to turn, direct towards something) is commonly used in plural form (τρόποι) to designate a person's ways, habits, character, temper; Ar. Pax 935 ἐσόμεθ' ἀλλήλοισιν ἀμνοὶ τοὺς τρόπους (we'll be like lambs in the way we treat one another), Eup. fr. 117 ἀνὴρ πολίτης πουλύπους ἐς τοὺς τρόπους (a citizen acting like an octopus), Aristopho fr. 5.1 οἷός εἰμι τοὺς τρόπους (what kind of person I am in my ways), Eub. fr. 38 σφόδρ' ἐστὶ τοὺς τρόπους Βοιώτιος (his behaviour is thoroughly Boeotian), etc. In the present fragment the term τρόποι refers to the hetaira's complaisant manners and accommodating conduct towards her man; cf. next note.

4b τοῖς τρόποις ὠνητέος An unexpected reversal of (gender and status) roles: it is not the man who needs to buy the hetaira (with money, that is), but the hetaira who – metaphorically – must buy (ὠνητέος) her man, with her subtle manners and obliging behaviour. The idea that it is the hetairai, and not their lovers, who need to fight to get a partner begins to look less paradoxical when we take into account the stereotypical conception of hetairai as rapacious creatures, notorious for their impeccable hunting skills; cf. Amphis fr. 23 "Interpretation".

4–5 ὠνητέος … ἀπιτέον As mentioned in the "Interpretation" section, this fragment, in arguing a paradox, is reminiscent of epideictic oratory and particularly of Gorgias. The verbal adjectives ὠνητέος and ἀπιτέον – although, admittedly, not forming a true homoioteleuton – catch the reader's/listener's attention, for they are emphatically positioned at the end of the verse and are heavily reminiscent of Gorgias' similar usage of verbal adjectives; cf. Gorg. Hel. 6: εἰ οὖν τῇ Τύχῃ καὶ τῷ θεῷ τὴν αἰτίαν ἀ ν α θ ε τ έ ο ν , τὴν Ἑλένην τῆς δυσκλείας ἀ π ο λ υ τ έ ο ν , and 19: οὐχ ὡς ἁμάρτημα μ ε μ π τ έ ο ν ἀλλ' ὡς ἀτύχημα ν ο μ ι σ τ έ ο ν . Apart from the present fragment, Amphis uses homoioteleuton – combined with antithesis in content – in fr. 23 (ll. 2 and 5) and fr. 33 (ll. 5 and 7); cf. comm. ad loc. There also exist a few other passages within Comedy, which exhibit analogously elaborate structure featuring various rhetorical techniques such as rhyme and symmetry; e. g. Ar. Nu. 711–715, Hermipp. fr. 48.1–3, Eup. fr. 176, Anaxandr. fr. 28, Mnesim. fr. 4.10–15, 27–28, Nicopho fr. 10. On homoioteleuton and antithesis see further Lausberg (1998) §§ 725–728 and §§ 787–807 respectively.

Ἀκκώ (Accō)
("Accō")

Discussion Meineke 1,404f.; Kock 2,236; Edmonds 2,312f.; PCG 2,214; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 293

No fragments survive from this play. The title-figure is a proverbial / legendary woman called Accō. She appears in the following sources: sch. on Pl. Grg. 497a (cf. below), Hermipp. fr. 6, Plu. CPG i.1.65, Zen. CPG i.1.53, Diogenian. CPG i.2.4, Et. Gen. α 333, Et. Gud. α 66, EM s. vv. ἀκκίζεσθαι and ἀκκισμοί (p. 49 K.), Zonar. s. vv. ἀκκισμοί and Ἀκκώ, Sud. α 878 and α 946, Chrysipp.Stoic. fr. 313. She is unanimously described as the archetypically silly female figure (apart from Chrysipp.Stoic. fr. 313 where she features as a bogeyman), and her name is etymologically linked with the verb ἀκκίζεσθαι (affect ignorance, affect being shocked). On a few occasions her name is preserved as Μακκώ (Maccō) instead and is etymologically linked with the verb μακκοάω (to be stupid): Tz. H. 4.6; Sud. μ 68, μ 69, μ 550; sch. on Ar. Eq. 62, on Nu. 1022, and on Ra. 990.

The present play-title is mentioned by the Scholiast on Plato's Gorgias, in an attempt to provide an etymology for the verb ἀκκίζεσθαι, which occurs in second person present indicative (ἀκκίζῃ) in Pl. Grg. 497a. Within the Platonic dialogue the verb is used by Socrates addressing Callicles. Additionally, the Scholiast testifies to the fact that the Old Comedy playwright Hermippus referred to this female figure as well, in his play The Birth of Athēna (fr. 6). On the manuscript tradition of Platonic scholia see Greene (1938) xi-xxxviii, esp. xiv-xix.

Schol. (B^2TW) Pl. Grg. 497a (Greene 1938: 159–160)

ἀκκίζῃ. τὸ ἀκκίζεσθαι ἐκ γυναικὸς εἰρῆσθαί φασιν Ἀκκοῦς καλουμένης, ἣν οὕτως εὐήθη λέγουσιν ὡς ἀπὸ τοῦ ἱστοῦ θοἰμάτιον καθελομένην ἡμίεργον ἀμφιέσασθαι, εἴς τε τὸ κάτοπτρον βλέπουσαν πρὸς τὴν παρ' αὐτῆς ἔμφασιν εἰς αὐτὸ γιγνομένην ὡς ἑτέρᾳ προσλαλεῖν γυναικί. μέμνηται ταύτης Ἕρμιππος ἐν Ἀθηνᾶς γοναῖς καὶ Ἄμφις ἐν τῷ ὁμωνύμῳ αὐτῇ δράματι. ἀκκίζει οὖν φησὶν ἀντὶ τοῦ ἀνοηταίνεις οἷα γυνή, μὴ εἰδέναι προσποιούμενος.

"akkizēi" (= "you play the innocent / naïve"): people say that the verb "akkizesthai" derives from a certain woman called Accō, whom they say was so silly, that after taking down a half-finished himation from the loom and wearing it, she looked in the mirror and, seeing herself in it, addressed her own reflection assuming it was another woman. Hermippus mentions her in "The Birth of Athena" and Amphis in his play that is named after her. Hence, he (i. e. Socrates) says "akkizei" instead of "you play the innocent" like a woman, pretending not to know.

From the genuinely ignorant and stupid Accō derives the verb ἀκκίζεσθαι, which essentially means behave like Accō, i. e. be or act stupid. But the sense can easily extend to pretend to be stupid, so that it entails the concept of feigned ignorance, affectedness, and even deceitfulness; cf. LSJ[9] s. v. (to dissemble, to affect indifference or ignorance or to be shocked). For the common practice of producing verbs out of personal names cf. εὐριπιδαριστοφανίζειν (write like Euripides and Aristophanes; Cratin. fr. 342), μελλονικιᾶν (delay victory, with a pun on Nicias; Ar. Av. 639; cf. Dunbar 1995: 414), σωκρατῶ (act like Socrates; Ar. Av. 1282), φιλιππιδόομαι (turn into a very Philippides, i. e. as skinny as Philippides; Alex. fr. 148).

The tradition of proverbially stupid persons goes back to [Homeric] Margites. Within Comedy Amphis was not the first who ventured to produce a comic play focusing on such a person. Plays entitled Μαμμάκυθος (The Blockhead) had already been produced by the Old Comic poets Aristagoras (PCG 2,258f.), Metagenes (PCG 7,4–6; cf. Orth 2014: 384–389), and Plato (PCG 7,464f. – in plural: Μαμμάκυθοι).

Almost all sources that mention Accō belong to later antiquity. Though the first instance of the verb ἀκκίζεσθαι occurs in Pindar fr. 203, this is however a conjecture by Bœckh (from Suda's text). Hermippus' reference and Amphis' current play constitute not only our only comic evidence, but also our earliest surviving evidence (fifth and fourth century BC respectively) regarding this legendary female figure. Modern scholars have argued that in Hermippus' play Accō had a sustained role challenging the goddess Athena, just like Arachnē did (Wilamowitz 1873: 141; Zieliński 1931: 92, 115). We have no means to know whether Amphis imitated – and if so, to what extent – Hermippus' treatment of Accō, whatever that was. It is possible that Amphis pictured Accō as a silly figure, just as the later tradition describes her.

Ἀλείπτρια (Aleiptria)
("The Anointress")

Discussion Meineke 1,393, 405; Kock 2,236; Edmonds 2,314f.; PCG 2,214; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 293

No fragments survive from this play. We know of two further comic plays entitled Aleiptria: one whose authorship has been contested ever since antiquity (Ath. 3.123b) between Alexis (PCG 2,29) and Antiphanes (PCG 2,322f.), with the latter poet probably being the genuine author (cf. Arnott 1996: 813–817), featuring one surviving fragment (Antiph. fr. 26), and a second homonymous play by Diphilus (PCG 5,55) with no surviving fragments.

The play-title denotes a female worker, an anointress, and belongs to the category of banausic titles of Amphis; cf. Intro. 4 ("Themes & Motifs").

The play is assigned to Amphis by Pollux, in Book 7 of his Onomasticon, where he mentions various types of τέχναι (arts and crafts, banausic professions, etc.). The passage is preserved in three codices. Pollux' codex A omits a piece of important information: that this was (arguably) the specific practice of the poets of Middle Comedy (μέσοι). On Pollux' manuscript tradition see Intro. 3 "Tradition & Reception".

Poll. 7.17 (codd. FS, A) τοῦ δ' ἀλείπτου οὐκ ὄντος ἐν χρήσει ἀλείπτριαν εἰρήκασιν οἱ μέσοι κωμικοὶ (μέσοι om. A) καὶ Λυσίας ἐν τῷ ὑπὲρ Διοφάντου περὶ χωρίου· Ἄμφιδος δὲ καὶ δρᾶμα ἔστιν Ἀλείπτρια.

Although the term "anointer" was not in use (cf. Poll. 3.154), the female term "anointress" was used by the Middle Comedy poets and by Lysias in his speech "In defense of Diophantus on the property" (fr. 98 C.); and there is also a play by Amphis called "The Anointress".

The term ἀλείπτης signifies the male assistant in gymnasia, whose task was to anoint the athletes with oil. Pollux describes this term as ἀδόκιμον, i. e. not proper Attic language. And he reiterates this elsewhere (3.154): καὶ ὁ ἐφεστηκὼς παιδοτρίβης τε καὶ γυμναστής, ἀφ' οὗ καὶ συγγυμναστὴς παρὰ Πλάτωνι καὶ παρὰ Ξενοφῶντι προγυμναστής· ὁ δ' ἀλείπτης ἀδόκιμον (and the supervisor was called a trainer and a gymnastic master, hence the terms suggumnastēs ("companion in physical training") in Plato (Sph. 218b) and progumnastēs ("preparatory trainer") in Xenophon (Lac. 3.4); but the term aleiptēs was not prevalent). Indeed, apart from two isolated cases, one in Aristotle (EN 1106b) and one in Hippocrates (Epid. 7.1.9 – albeit with reference to medicine, not sports), the term aleiptēs came into common use much later, around the second century BC onwards. Until then the terms παιδοτρίβης (trainer), γυμναστής (specialized trainer of professional athletes), and even ἀγωνοθέτης (judge of the contests) were used instead (Hsch. π 79, Sud. π 867 and α 1157, sch. on Pl. Ly. 207d, Zonar. s. v. ἀλείπτης), since these professionals often also undertook the task of oil anointment, and so the distinction among them only arose with time; e. g. the profession of γυμναστής begins to stand out and differentiates from παιδοτρίβης in the late fifth century BC. Similarly, the term aleiptēs is becoming increasingly common from the second century BC onwards, probably reflecting a more clear-cut definition of roles and responsibilities among the sports-related professionals; cf. Plb. 27.7.1, Philo Leg. 1.98, Plu. 130b, D.L. 8.46, etc. See Gardiner (1910) 506; Harris (1964) 171; Kyle (1987) 141–145.

It is conspicuous that during the same period when the male ἀλείπτης is not being used, the female term ἀλείπτρια does occur, and accumulatively so, in Comedy. The three play-titles by Amphis, Antiphanes (or Alexis), and Diphilus, plus one singular instance in Lysias (fr. 98 Carey, in an unknown context), constitute the only existing evidence for this term; and to complicate things further, the one instance in Lysias is all that survives from that speech (Ὑπὲρ Διοφάντου περὶ χωρίου – oration no. 42 C.). Aside from that, there is a blatant lack of information regarding such a female worker. Grammatically speaking, Arnott is right in saying that (1996: 814) "an ἀλείπτρια would be the female counterpart of an ἀλείπτης". One reasonably wonders whether the aleiptria-figure was simply Comedy's creation with no existing equivalent in real life. What is also noteworthy – and puzzling – is that in all three comic cases the term ἀλείπτρια occurs not as a passing reference, but as a play-title meaning that the plot of the entire play was structured upon and centred on this female figure, who was probably the protagonist and whose behaviour/adventures provided some interesting material, in order to sustain a successful stage performance. Arnott already (1996: 814–817) seriously considers the possibility of a hetaira being the protagonist of Antiphanes' Ἀλείπτρια, on the basis of some internal evidence from fr. 26 (e. g. ἐργαστήριον as a double entendre for a brothel).

A hetaira doubling as an anointress is a plausible option for Amphis' current play too; that is, a hetaira who supplemented the sexual services she provided to her customers with other, pampering, activities, such as massaging and anointing them with perfumed oil. And there is a good case to be made for this. We do know that it was not uncommon for hetairai to double in another trade as a means of supplementing their income. Wool-working in particular was very popular and there is a concrete pattern of hetairai who doubled as wool-workers. This practice is believed to have been imprinted on a vast number of vases featuring female wool-workers, the so-called "spinning hetairai"; see Davidson (1997) 83–91, 112–113, and comm. on Amphis' Ἔριθοι. There is even a relevant anecdote recorded by Strabo 8.6.20: μνημονεύεταί τις ἑταίρα πρὸς τὴν ὀνειδίζουσαν, ὅτι οὐ φιλεργὸς εἴη οὐδ' ἐρίων ἅπτοιτο, εἰπεῖν "ἐγὼ μέντοι ἡ τοιαύτη τρεῖς ἤδη καθεῖλον ἱστοὺς ἐν βραχεῖ χρόνῳ τούτῳ" (it is told how a hetaira replied to the woman who accused her that she was not industrious nor would she touch any wool: "Yet, such as I am, in this short time I have already taken down three webs" – with a double entendre on τρεῖς καθεῖλον ἱστούς, also meaning relieved three erections).

Likewise, given that it was not only Amphis but two further playwrights who wrote homonymous plays about an aleiptria, we may presume that there existed a sub-category of hetairai, nicknamed ἀλείπτριαι, who pursued their business in this particular way. It is possible that these hetairai frequented the gymnasia, where they provided their combination of services, sex and oil-anointment, to their customers the athletes. It is instructive that in Plautus' Cistellaria a hetaira is called Gymnasium.

Ἀλκμαίων vel -έων (Alcmaiōn or Alcmeōn)
("Alcmaiōn" or "Alcmeōn")

Discussion Meineke 1,423; Bothe 480; Kock 2,236; Edmonds 2,314f.; PCG 2,214; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 293f.

Title I follow Kassel-Austin in printing the title with both spellings (Ἀλκμαίων or Ἀλκμέων), since the orthography of the name is frequently linked in our sources with the identity of the person in question. The manuscripts of Pollux, our only source for Amphis' play, preserve the writing with the diphthong 'αι' (Ἀλκμαίων). But in the Attic dialect the name normally appears with an epsilon (Ἀλκμέων), and this is confirmed by substantial inscriptional evidence from Attica; see Threatte (1980) 1.296. Accordingly, the literary sources tend to reserve (though not strictly so) the spelling with the diphthong 'αι' (Ἀλκμαίων) for the philosopher Alcmaeon from Doric Croton (e. g. Arist. Metaph. 986ª27, Id. HA 581ª16, D.L. 8.83; cf. Longrigg (1993) 47–81, Huffman 2013), and the spelling with the epsilon (Ἀλκμέων) for Alcmeon the son of Megacles and also for the mythical Alcmeon (e. g. Hdt. 6.125, Plu. 88f, D. C. Hist.Rom. 61.16.2,2; see also the homonymous tragic plays below); cf. Anon. Epimer. alphab. in Anecd. Oxon. 2,337.4 Cramer: Ἀλκμέωνας· τὸ 'με' ψιλόν, ὡς παρ' Εὐριπίδῃ ἔχει ἡ χρῆσις. Despite being Doric in origin (Argive), the mythical Alcmeon was treated by Attic tragedy in an Attic context, where the presence of an epsilon was dictated not only by the demand of the local dialect but also by metrical reasons: Ἀλκμέων with an epsilon can be accommodated much easier in the iambic trimeter (it gives the sequence –⏑–, whereas Ἀλκμαίων gives a run of three long elements). Regarding Pollux' writing with 'αι' (Ἀλκμαίων), this may be either a mistake or simply an uninterested and immaterial spelling choice; but whatever the case, it cannot be used as evidence for the figure's identity.

Amphis' play probably dealt with the mythical Alcmeon (just like tragedy did extensively; see below), the son of the Argive king Amphiaraus and Eriphyle and leader of the Epigoni during the second attack against the city of Thebes. After the expedition Alcmeon committed matricide, following Apollo's instructions, thus taking revenge for Eriphyle's past treachery that had led to his father's death. He was subsequently driven mad by the Erinyes and sought refuge and purification with relatives and friends in the Peloponnese and mainland Greece. He was eventually purified by the River Achelous, but was then murdered by the sons of Phegeus, king of Psophis, for betraying their father's trust. See Apollod. 3.80–95, D.S. 4.66, Paus. 8.24.7–10, Pi. P. 8.41–47 (cf. Pfeijffer 1999: 530–534), Th. 2.102.5. See Gantz (1993) 506–510, 522–528.

Apart from one other homonymous comic play by the Middle Comedy poet Mnesimachus (PCG 7,16–17), there is a conspicuously recurrent treatment of Alcmeon's story by tragedy, and especially by – contemporary to Amphis – fourth century tragedy. The following tragic poets wrote an Ἀλκμέων: Sophocles (TrGF 4,149f.), Euripides (Ἀλκμέων α΄: ὁ διὰ Ψωφίδος and Ἀλκμέων β΄: ὁ διὰ Κορίνθου, TrGF 5.1,205–218), Agathon (TrGF 1,161), Astydamas (TrGF 1,200), Theodectes (TrGF 1,230f.), Timotheus (TrGF 1,196), and Nicomachus (Ἀλκμαίων vel Τυνδάρεως, TrGF 1,285); in addition, there is a homonymous satyr play by Achaeus (TrGF 1,119). The frequent engagement of the tragic genre with this theme is reflected in two fragments from Middle Comedy: Antiph. fr. 189.8–12: ἂν πάλιν / εἴπῃ τις Ἀλκμέωνα, καὶ τὰ παιδία / πάντ' εὐθὺς εἴρηχ', ὅτι μανεὶς ἀπέκτονε / τὴν μητέρ', ἀγανακτῶν δ' Ἄδραστος εὐθέως / ἥξει πάλιν τ' ἄπεισι (again, if someone mentions Alcmeon, he's as good as named all his children, plus the fact that he went crazy and killed his mother, and that Adrastus is going to get annoyed and come straight home and go off again), and Timocl. fr. 6.8–9, 12: τοὺς γὰρ τραγῳδοὺς πρῶτον … σκόπει, / ὡς ὠφελοῦσι πάντας … ὁ νοσῶν τι μανικὸν Ἀλκμέων' ἐσκέψατο (consider first the benefits the tragedians bestow on everyone … the man who's a bit unstable thinks of Alcmeon).

Two alternatives regarding the title-figure are worth mentioning. First, Alcmaeon the fifth century philosopher and medical theorist from Croton; cf. D.L. 8.83. This hypothesis was advanced by Meineke 1,423 (though withdrawn at 3,567) regarding Mnesimachus' homonymous play. A second well-known Alcmeon was the son of Megacles, who lived in the sixth century BC, famous for having been made rich by Croesus; cf. Hdt. 6.125, Eup. fr. 192.90–91.

fr. 2 (2 K.)

Poll. 10.170 (codd. FS, ABCL) καὶ πηνήκην δὲ καὶ προκόμιον, καὶ ὡς Ἀριστοφάνης ἐν Γηρυτάδῃ περίθεσιν· καὶ π ε ρ ι θ έ τ η ν δέ, ὡς ἐν Ἀμφιδος (ἐν Ἀμ. om. A) Ἀλκμαίωνι καὶ Μενάνδρου Ὀλυνθίᾳ.

Then you might say "pēnēkē" and "prokomion", and, as Aristophanes says in Gerytades (fr. 187), "perithesis"; and "p e r i t h e t ē " ("hairpiece"), as in Amphis' "Alcmeon" and Menander's "Olynthia" (fr. 260).

Metre Unknown

⏑⏑⏑–

Discussion Meineke 3,301; Kock 2,236; PCG 2,214

Citation Context In 10.170 Pollux registers the usage of the rare noun περιθέτη (hairpiece). In Book 10 of his Onomasticon Pollux enlists a wide range of paraphernalia (σκεύη), which he categorises from the outset (10.10) into those pertaining to the household (κατ' οἰκίαν χρήσιμα), the fields (κατ' ἀγρούς), and the arts (τέχνας). It is in the latter category that the discussion of terms denoting various types of hairpiece appears. Pollux claims that both Amphis and Menander (fr. 260) used the term περιθέτην (in accusative form). Yet, the accusative is the case that syntactically suits Pollux to structure his lemma, and it is not certain that Amphis (or Menander) used the accusative case as well. Earlier in his work (2.35) Pollux mentions again several alternative terms for hairpiece, within a discussion about hair: ἔλεγον δὲ καὶ κεφαλὴν περίθετον, ὡς Ἀριστοφάνης, καὶ ὡς ἂν εἴποιεν οἱ νῦν περιθέτην, καὶ πάλιν τὴν περίθετον κόμην (they also used to say "kephalēn peritheton", as Aristophanes does (Th. 258), or else, as men of the present day would say, "perithetēn" or "peritheton komēn").

Constitution of Text The passage is preserved in most of Pollux' codices. The information that the Alcmeon play meant here is the one by Amphis (and not e. g. the one by Mnesimachus or any of the tragic plays) is present in all Pollux' codices that preserve the passage, apart from codex A. On Pollux' manuscript tradition see Intro. 3 ("Tradition & Reception").

Interpretation The noun περιθέτη, ἡ, means hairpiece and features only sporadically in our sources; cf. Men. fr. 260 (preserved by Pollux 10.170, along with Amphis' present fragment), Ath. 10.415a-b: περιθέτην ἔχουσα καὶ λόφον ἐπὶ τῆς κεφαλῆς (wearing a hairpiece and a crest on top of her head), Phot. π 417.11 περίθετος κεφαλή: ἡ περιθέτη. The noun περιθέτη (just like the germane adjectives περίθετος,-ον, proparoxytone with two endings, and περιθετός,-ή,-όν, oxytone with three endings) derives from the verb περιτίθημι (to put around). Accordingly, περιθέτη designates an object that can be applied around something, i. e. hairpiece, wig, postiche, etc., which naturally encircles the perimeter of the head. Such a hairpiece was widely used by women or effeminate men; cf. Paus.Gr. δ 12: πηνήκην γὰρ οἱ ἀρχαῖοι Ἀττικοὶ τὴν ἐκ τῶν τριχῶν περιθετὴν κόμην, χρηστὴν οὐ μόνον γυναιξίν, ἀλλὰ καὶ γυναικιζομένοις ἀνδράσιν, οἳ τριχῶν ἐψίλωνται, ὡς φενάκην, ἣ τοὺς ὁρῶντας ἀπατᾷ (the old Athenians used to call πηνήκην – "wig" the postiche made of hair, which was used not only by women but also by womanish men, who were deprived of hair, as a toupe that deceives the onlookers), Ar. Th. 258 κεφαλὴ περίθετος, ἣν ἐγὼ νύκτωρ φορῶ (the wig that I wear by night; here the speaker is the effeminate Agathon, referring to his promiscuity; cf. Austin & Olson 2004: 137–138; Given 2007); cf. also Aristomen. fr. 5 περίθετον πρόσωπον (cf. Orth 2014: 61–62), D. C. Hist.Rom. 79.13.2 περιθεταῖς κόμαις χρώμενος, etc. See Page (1981) 313–314.

Ἀμπελουργός (Ampelourgos)
("The Vinedresser")

Discussion PCG 2,214; Papachrysostomou 35–36

Title Alexis also wrote an Ampelourgos (PCG 2,29). This is one of the nine shared play-titles between Amphis and Alexis (cf. Intro. 8). It also belongs to the category of banausic titles of Amphis (cf. Intro. 4).

Of the three surviving fragments only one (fr. 3) bears some peripheral relation to the title, since it refers to τέχνη (art/knowledge/skill). According to Theophrastus (CP 2.4.8, 3.14–15), the ἀμπελουργός was the person in charge of planting, cultivating, and pruning vineyards. Apart from Amphis' and Alexis' play-titles, the only other vinedresser we hear of in Comedy is Trygaeus in Aristophanes' Peace, who introduces himself as ἀμπελουργὸς δεξιός (an accomplished vinedresser; l. 190).

Regarding the plot of the current play, it evidently centred around the title-figure of the vinedresser. The plot of Alexis' homonymous play, which might perhaps provide us with a parallel, is unfortunately beyond recovery (Arnott 1996: 81). But both Amphis' and Alexis' Ampelourgos-plays form part of a distinct group of comic plays that bear agricultural titles; these are Aristophanes' Γεωργοί (Farmers; PCG 3.2,77–88), Antiphanes' Κηπουρός (The Gardener; PCG 2,372), Menander's Γεωργός (The Farmer; LCL Menander I.97–137) and possibly Timocles' Γεωργός too (PCG 7,756). The common interest in agricultural activities is of course the only shared characteristic that we can positively detect in these plays; any attempt to establish further intertextual links would be mere surmise.

A recurrent motif that emerges in Amphis' surviving fragments is the imagery of ill-luck and calamity (fr. 3: ἀτυχίας, συμφοράς, and fr. 4: ἀτυχήσῃ), set within a melancholic atmosphere; cf. in particular the speaker's tone in fr. 3. One may argue that this sombreness is simply accidental, especially since fr. 4 is anthologised by Stobaeus in his section on misfortune (περὶ κακοδαιμονίας), which means that Stobaeus was especially searching for such passages. Yet fr. 3, which equally generates melancholy, is found not in the misfortune section but in the section on arts (περὶ τεχνῶν). If not immaterial to the play's plot, this dysphoria may be interpreted in a variety of ways. For example, the play could deal with the protagonist's life of hardship in the countryside whilst struggling to make ends meet through vinedressing; in such a case the play may have prefigured plot-elements comparable to Menander's Dyscolus (i. e. a farmer in a remote area trying to make a living). Certainty though is impossible and this unease could be due to other reasons, either transient or permanent throughout the play's plot. In the absence of hard evidence all possibilities need to remain open.

fr. 3 (3 K.)

οὐκ ἔστιν οὐδὲν ἀτυχίας ἀνθρωπίνης παραμύθιον γλυκύτερον ἐν βίῳ τέχνης· ἐπὶ τοῦ μαθήματος γὰρ ἑστηκὼς ὁ νοῦς αὐτὸν λέληθε παραπλέων τὰς συμφοράς

4 αὐτὸν Meineke: αὐτοῦ SMA παραπλέων SM: -ον A

For human ill-luck there is no sweeter assuagement in life than skill; for the mind, firmly positioned on knowledge, sails past the misfortunes without noticing

Stob. 4.18.1 (περὶ τεχνῶν / on arts) p. 406 H. (codd. SMA)
Ἄμφιδος ἐξ Ἀμπελουργοῦ· οὐκ — συμφοράς
From Amphis, from "The Vinedresser": "For — noticing"

Metre Iambic trimeter

1. ——⏑— ⏑|⏑⏑⏑— ——⏑— (penthemimeral caesura)
2. ⏑⏑—⏑— ⏑⏑⏑⏑|— ⏑—⏑— (hephthemimeral caesura)
3. ⏑⏑—⏑— ⏑—⏑|— ——⏑— (hephthemimeral caesura)
4. ——⏑— ⏑|⏑⏑⏑— ——⏑— (penthemimeral caesura)

Discussion Meineke 3,302; Bothe 480; Kock 2,237; Edmonds 2,314f.; PCG 2,215; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 294; Papachrysostomou 36–37

Citation Context Stobaeus dedicates Chapter 18 of Book 4 to arts and crafts (περὶ τεχνῶν) and accordingly compiles a number of passages (from a wide variety of genres) making the case for and against art(s). Amphis' fragment leads the first group of passages (4.18a), which praise the value and importance of art / knowledge / skill in people's lives.

Constitution of Text The fragment is preserved by three codices of Stobaeus, S, M, and A (on Stobaeus' manuscript tradition see Intro. 3 "Tradition & Reception"). In l. 4 the manuscript tradition unanimously preserves the reading αὐτοῦ, which Meineke corrected to αὐτόν. Meineke's suggestion is preferred and adopted, since the accusative singular of the reflexive pronoun (αὑτόν) provides for a correct syntactical structure (the verb λανθάνω normally takes the accusative, e. g. Ar. fr. 30 λέληθ' ἐμαυτόν; cf. LSJ[9] s. v. and see comm. on l. 4 below). Within the same line codices S and M preserve the correct reading παραπλέων (masculine gender, defining νοῦς), whereas codex A erroneously preserves παραπλέον (neuter gender).

Interpretation The stereotypical structure of the first line helps us identify this fragment as the beginning of a soliloquy (cf. comm. s. v. οὐκ ἔστιν οὐδέν). The speaker ponders on the importance of art / knowledge and the value of possessing a skill (τέχνη – μάθημα). Through a succinct metaphor that employs an image of the sea (ll. 3–4), the comic character personifies the mind and visualises his conception of knowledge. The metaphor suggests that knowledge / skill is valuable for the mind as a welcome distraction from misfortune. That is, when a person struck by calamity is being kept busy practising a skill he possesses, the mind focuses on this activity instead of mulling over misfortunes.

But perhaps the most conspicuous feature of this fragment is the speaker's pronounced tendency towards generalisation in argument, which borders on the exercise of (fake) philosophy. Already in Old Comedy this tendency – though not prominent – can be detected being crystallized into a pattern, which consists of arguments arising from a character's situation but pursued in a way that turns them into generalised or abstract discussions about trends in human life; cf. Ar. Pl. 418–609 (a debate about the role of poverty in society), and to a lesser extent V. 655–724 (a brief account of the vices of the Athenian political scene). This pattern is heavily reminiscent of tragedy, particularly Euripidean; e. g. Med. 214–251 (about the helplessness of women), Hipp. 373–390 (Phaedra's generalisations concerning what makes people abandon their sense of duty; cf. ibid. 176–197). It appears repeatedly in Middle Comedy (e. g. Amphis fr. 21 (ubi vide) and Philetaer. fr. 7 on mortality and pleasure, Eub. fr. 115 on marrying a woman, Aristopho fr. 11 on Eros' winged nature, etc.), and is further picked up by Menander (e. g. Dysc. 271–298: about the recommended behaviour of the rich and poor; Epit. 1087–1099: Onesimus' speech about how the gods introduced character as each individual's personal god). See further Papachrysostomou (2012–2013a) 167–173.

1 οὐκ ἔστιν οὐδέν The phrase constitutes a stylistic topos within the linguistic register of dramatic poetry. It is commonly employed for a specific purpose, i. e. to introduce a soliloquy where the speaker contemplates and even (quasi-)philosophises about a current dramatic situation. This formula is sometimes followed by a comparison structured upon οὐδέν (here: γλυκύτερον τέχνης, l. 2). This stylistic pattern serves to emphatically present an opinion as an introductory statement, which the speaker justifies, explains, and builds upon further in the subsequent speech. It also lets the speaker lend an air of authority and undeniability to their case.

Most instructive is the evidence we derive from tragedy. For example, the prologue of Euripides' Orestes begins with Electra soliloquising: οὐκ ἔστιν οὐδὲν δεινὸν ὧδ' εἰπεῖν ἔπος / οὐδὲ πάθος οὐδὲ ξυμφορὰ θεήλατος, / ἧς οὐκ ἂν ἄραιτ' ἄχθος ἀνθρώπου φύσις (1–3); later in the same play a long soliloquy by Orestes starts likewise: οὐκ ἔστιν οὐδὲν κρεῖσσον ἢ φίλος σαφής (1155). And in Sophocles' Ajax Tecmessa begins a monologue in a comparable way: τῆς ἀναγκαίας τύχης / οὐκ ἔστιν οὐδὲν μεῖζον ἀνθρώποις κακόν (485–486). For mid-speech occurrences see E. Hel. 1617–1618, E. Hec. 805, S. Ant. 702.

Regarding Comedy, our evidence – though by and large fragmentary (meaning that we cannot always incontrovertibly verify where a soliloquy actually begins) – is still tangible enough to strongly suggest usage comparable to tragedy's; cf. Amphis fr. 37 (fr. consisting of four lines): οὐκ ἔστιν, ὡς ἔοικε, φάρμακον μέθης / οὐδὲν τοιοῦτον (cf. comm. ad loc.), Antiph. fr. 159.1–2 (fr. consisting of ten lines): οὐκ ἔστιν οὐδὲν θηρίον τῶν ἰχθύων / ἀτυχέστερον (there's no animal more unfortunate than fish), Diph. fr. 87.1–2 (fr. consisting of five lines): οὐκ ἔστιν οὐδὲν τεχνίον ἐξωλέστερον / τοῦ πορνοβοσκοῦ (there's no occupation more awful than being a pimp), Men. fr. 191.1–2 (fr. consisting of five lines) οὐκ ἔστιν οὐδέν, πάτερ, ἐν ἀνθρώπου φύσει / μεῖζον λογισμοῦ (father, there's nothing more important in human nature than reason), Damox. fr. 2.9 (the speaker's part starts here and continues until line 30): οὐκ ἔστιν οὐθὲν τοῦ πονεῖν σοφώτερον (there's nothing wiser than hard work), Xenarch. fr. 7.4–5 (though not at the beginning, here the speaker turns to the discussion of a new point): τῶν δ' ἰχθυοπωλῶν φιλοσοφώτερον γένος / οὐκ ἔστιν οὐδὲν οὐδὲ μᾶλλον ἀνόσιον (there's no breed more profound than the fishmongers or more depraved), etc.

It is noteworthy that all comic instances originate in fourth century Comedy. The only occurrence from a fifth century play is Ar. Av. 1342 (οὐκ ἔστιν οὐδὲν τοῦ πέτεσθαι γλυκύτερον; nothing's as much fun as flying), which is not the beginning of a soliloquy. Therefore, one may reasonably presume that this stylistic pattern originated in fifth century tragedy and was subsequently reproduced by the comic playwrights, often within a (more or less) humorous context of fake philosophising.

On balance, taking into consideration all surviving evidence, we can confidently identify Amphis' fragment as the beginning of a monologue.

2 παραμύθιον Assuagement, consolation, relief. This is the only occurrence of the term (or any of its cognates) within surviving Comedy. But the nouns παραμύθιον and παραμυθία, as well as the verb παραμυθέομαι occur frequently in tragedy and are even more popular in philosophical texts; e. g. S. El. 130 (παραμύθιον), Ant. 935 (παραμυθοῦμαι); E. IA 1617 (παραμυθεῖσθαι), Or. 298 (παραμυθοῦ), fr. 752f.10 (παραμύθια); also παραμύθιον in Pl. Phdr. 240d, Euthd. 272b, Lg. 704d, and παραμυθεῖσθαι in Pl. Plt. 268b, Prt. 346b, Mx. 247c, R. 476e. The marked usage of παραμύθιον by Amphis sustains the fragment's quasi-philosophising / cogitative nature.

2–3 τέχνης – μαθήματος Τέχνη can mean art, skill / craft, cunning way / manner, etc.; and μάθημα can mean lesson / learning, knowledge, etc. (cf. LSJ[9] s. vv.). Despite not being synonymous and despite their wide range of meanings, notionally the two terms can still be very closely related, since μάθημα, in the sense of "the result of learning", i. e. "knowledge", can equal some kind of "skill", "art" (τέχνη). Likewise, in this fragment the two terms are assigned a parallel and comprehensive sense of learning / knowledge / possession (and practice) of a skill. The structure of the fragment substantiates the parallel meaning of the two terms: in the first distich the speaker states his belief as an axiom, and in the second distich he emphatically reiterates and explicates it (cf. γάρ) through a graphic metaphor.

The importance of skill (τέχνη), as a valuable means that can protect people against the misfortunes of life, is also praised elsewhere in Comedy, within a similar contemplative context; e. g. Philem. fr. 178.6–7 (also employing a sea-image) κἂν μὲν ὁρμισθῇ τις ἡμῶν εἰς λιμένα τὸν <τῆς> τέχνης, / ἐβάλετ' ἄγκυραν καθάψας ἀσφαλείας εἵνεκα (and if someone brings himself into the harbour of skill, it is as if he casts a firm anchor as far as personal safety is concerned); Hipparch.Com. fr. 2 πολύ γ' ἐστὶ πάντων κτῆμα τιμιώτατον / ἅπασιν ἀνθρώποισιν εἰς τὸ ζῆν τέχνη. / τὰ μὲν γὰρ ἄλλα καὶ πόλεμος καὶ μεταβολαὶ / τύχης ἀνήλωσ', ἡ τέχνη δὲ σῴζεται (skill is by far the most valuable possession in life for all people; for war and fortune's vicissitudes sweep everything else away, but skill survives), etc.

3 ὁ νοῦς Here the term νοῦς is being used to designate the mind as the seat of both thinking and feeling. The idea that mind constitutes the seat of intellect was first introduced into Greek philosophical tradition by Alcmaeon of Croton; see Huffman 2013 (with further bibliography). In Amphis' fragment the mind inevitably reflects upon misfortunes, but finds solace in knowledge and/or practising a skill. The mind is tangibly personified, being pictured as a sailor who, safe on his vessel, sails past misfortunes, as if they were treacherous reefs (see below for a detailed analysis of the metaphor). However, despite the uniqueness of this personification, picturing the mind as a concrete entity and a mobile agent is a commonly recurring pattern in Comedy. Within this pattern the mind is always the subject of the sentence and, hence, personified; e. g. Ar. Ach. 398 ὁ νοῦς μὲν ἔξω ξυλλέγων ἐπύλλια (the mind is outside collecting versicles); Pax 669 ὁ νοῦς γὰρ ἡμῶν ἦν τότ' ἐν τοῖς σκύτεσιν (at that time our mind was in our shoe leather); V. 93 ὁ νοῦς πέτεται τὴν νύκτα περὶ τὴν κλεψύδραν (the mind flutters around the water clock all night long); Pl.Com. fr. 188.3–4 ὑμῖν γὰρ οὐδέν … ἐν τῷ καπήλῳ νοῦς ἐνεῖναί μοι δοκεῖ (your mind doesn't seem to me to be in the wineshop); Alex. fr. 279.4 ὁ νοῦς γάρ ἐστι τῆς τραπέζης πλησίον (because the mind is fixed on the table). Cf. Amphis fr. 33 ("Interpretation" and comm. on ll. 2–3), S. Tr. 272–273, E. Ion 251.

3–4 ἐπὶ τοῦ μαθήματος … συμφοράς In this distich the speaker, maintaing the initially assumed philosophical tenor, employs an elaborate metaphor of a sea image, in order to visualise his conception of skill and knowledge, and thus underline their value. The preposition ἐπί objectifies knowledge (μάθημα) and projects a solid visualisation of it as a vessel, on which the mind positions itself firmly (ἑστηκώς). Safe on this vessel, the mind gets distracted and, without noticing (αὑτὸν λέληθε), circumvents and sails past easily (παραπλέων) the misfortunes (τὰς συμφοράς) as if they were dangerous reefs and rocks. The double usage of the perfect tense, ἑστηκώς and λέληθε, is quintessential here, for it expresses stability of state; i. e. position and unawareness respectively.

Images of sea are commonplace within Greek literature; cf. Hom. Il. 15.381–383, Alc. fr. 326 LP, A. Th. 2–3, S. OT 22–24, etc. See Musurillo (1967) 81. But what is captivating in this fragment is that the image of the ship stands not for e. g. the state as in Alcaeus l. c., but for knowledge / skill; and this is an original concept. The metaphor implies that knowledge and skill constitute a comforting solace for the mind, in the sense that the practical application of acquired knowledge and / or the exercise of a specific skill can effectively divert the mind from any incurred calamities and other disquieting issues, which therefore can be endured more easily and more tranquilly. For when the mind is preoccupied practising a known skill, it naturally becomes absorbed in this activity and ceases paying attention to all troubles.

4 αὑτὸν λέληθε παραπλέων The accusative of the reflexive pronoun often accompanies the verb λανθάνω, with a participle also normally present (here παραπλέων). In this case verb and pronoun translate adverbially together as without noticing, unawares, whereas the participle translates as a verb. Cf. Ar. Pax 32 ἕως σαυτὸν λάθῃς διαρραγείς (until you burst apart without noticing), Nu. 242 πόθεν δ' ὑπόχρεως σαυτὸν ἔλαθες γενόμενος; (how did you become indebted without noticing it?); Pl. Alc. I 127d κινδυνεύω δὲ καὶ πάλαι λεληθέναι ἐμαυτὸν αἴσχιστα ἔχων (I fear that for some time past I have lived unawares in a disgraceful condition).

fr. 4 (4 K.)

ἐν οἷς ἂν ἀτυχήσῃ τις ἄνθρωπος τόποις ἥκιστα τούτοις πλησιάζων ἥδεται

Wherever a man has been unfortunate, those places he is least pleased to approach

Stob. 4.40.6 (περὶ κακοδαιμονίας / on misfortune) vol. V p. 921 Hense (codd. SMA, Mac.)
Ἄμφιδος ἐξ Ἀμπελουργοῦ (ἐξ Ἀμπ. om. S)· ἐν — ἥδεται

From Amphis, from "The Vinedresser": "Wherever — approach"

Metre Iambic trimeter

1. ⏑–⏑⏑ ––⏑|– ––⏑– (hephthemimeral caesura)
2. ––⏑– –|–⏑– ––⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)

Discussion Meineke 1,302; Bothe 480; Kock 2,237; PCG 2,215

Citation Context In Chapter 40 of Book 4 Stobaeus anthologises a series of twenty-six quotations pertaining to misfortune (περὶ κακοδαιμονίας). Within this catalogue comic quotations are a minority; apart from Amphis, five fragments by Menander and one by Diphilus are included in Stobaeus' record. The fragment is preserved by three codices of Stobaeus (S, M, and A), and by Macarius Chrysocephalus; cf. Intro. 3 ("Tradition & Reception").

Constitution of Text Stobaeus' codex S leaves out the play's title.

Interpretation This fragment features the same philosophising tone as fr. 3 and resumes the theme of misfortune and ill-luck. The speaker contends that men feel pain and distress when approaching places where in the past they have experienced ill-luck, met failure, or suffered any kind of adversity. The original context of this distich is beyond recovery. It is equally hard to establish whether the sorrow that the speaker tries to alleviate through knowledge in fr. 3 originates from the same unfortunate event(s) that grieve(s) the speaker in fr. 4.

It is remarkable that this distich constitutes the earliest testimony of a literary topos that is commonly found in later, mostly Latin, literature, i. e. that people deliberately avoid a place where some kind of misfortune took place in the past; cf. Ovid Tristia 1.1.85–86: "et mea cumba semel vasta percussa procella / illum, quo laesa est, horret adire locum" (and even so my bark, once shattered by a mighty storm, dreads to approach that place where it was wrecked), Phaedrus 1.18.1: "nemo libenter recolit qui laesit locum" (no one likes to revisit the place which has brought him injury), Martial 1.85.5–6 "servos ibi perdidit omnes / et pecus et fructus; non amat inde locum" (he lost all his slaves there and his livestock and crops; therefore he doesn't like the place), Choricius 12.2.59 (p. 166,19 F.-R.): τὸν τόπον αὐτὸν ἐν ᾧ κακῶς πράττουσιν ἄνθρωποι δεινῶς ἀποστρέφονται (people strongly avoid the place where they fared ill).

1 ἀτυχήσῃ Here the verb ἀτυχέω is intransitive, meaning to be unfortunate, fail; cf. Ar. Nu. 427, Philem. fr. 107.

2 ἥκιστα … ἥδεται Through the rhetorical figure of litotēs the comic character means exactly the opposite of what he actually says; "least pleased" is meant to signify "most displeased" (e. g. μάλιστα θλίβεται). The usage of litotēs adds emphasis to the statement.

fr. 5 (5 K.)

Poll. 9.88
οὐ κέρμα λέγειν Ἀττικόν, παρὰ μέντοι τοῖς Δωριεῦσι καὶ τὸ κέρμα ἔστιν εἰρημένον· εὕροι δ' ἄν τις αὐτὸ καὶ παρὰ τοῖς Ἀττικοῖς, ὥσπερ ἐν τῷ Ἀμφιδος Ἀμπελουργῷ μικρόν τι κέρμα.

The term "kerma" (="coin") is not compatible with Attic usage, but among the Dorians "kerma" is used too [i. e. in addition to the term χρήματα, mentioned earlier in Pollux' text]; but you could also find it in Attic authors, as for example in Amphis' Ampelourgos, a little coin.

Poll. 7.170
κέρματα δὲ πολλῶν πληθυντικῶς εἰρηκότων, κέρμα ἑνικῶς Ἄμφις εἴρηκεν ἐν Ἀμπελουργῷ.

Despite the fact that many use the term "kermata" in plural, Amphis mentions "kerma" in singular in the Ampelourgos.

Metre Iambic trimeter (probably)
– – ⏑ – ×

Discussion Meineke 3,302; Bothe 480f.; Kock 2,237; PCG 2,215

Citation Context Within his Onomasticon Pollux refers twice to Amphis' usage of the term κέρμα (coin). In 9.88 his interest lies with the fact that, although it is not compatible with Attic usage, he finds an example of it in Amphis (as a second example he quotes Antiph. fr. 129). In 7.170 (where Amphis' actual words are not quoted) Pollux observes that, contrary to the majority's usage of the plural number κέρματα, Amphis (along with Antiph. l. c. again) employs the singular form κέρμα.

Interpretation Pollux' purely linguistic interest in this fragment meant that only the tiny part that mattered to him survived in his lexicon. Though unprovable, it is possible that the three surviving words originally belonged in a transaction context. Regarding the object(s) of the transaction, although the possibilities seem infinite, characters in Middle (and New) Comedy – unlike Old – mention money and/or engage in monetary transactions for mainly two reasons; when they need to buy either a hetaira's services or market goods. Interestingly, Eub. fr. 82.7 employs similar terms to express the notion of low price in relation to hetairai (μικροῦ πρίασθαι κέρματος τὴν ἡδονήν); see further s. v. μικρὸν κέρμα.

κέρμα Pollux is correct in observing (9.88) that the usage of the term κέρμα was not very common within the Attic dialect. Indeed, κέρμα occurs rather sporadically in our texts, comic and other. Instead of the term κέρμα(τα), what we repeatedly come across in Comedy (and elsewhere) are the collective terms ἀργύριον (Ar. Nu. 98), ἀργυρίδιον (Ar. Lys. 1050), χρυσίον (Ar. Pax 645), and χαλκίον (Eub. fr. 81), as well as ὀβολός (obol) and its multiples διώβολον (double obol), τριώβολον (three-obol-piece; i. e. half-drachma), and πεντώβολον (five obols). Within Comedy, κέρμα is used only ten times (six in singular form and four in plural), which is a fairly small percentage compared to some one hundred and thirty instances of the term ὀβολός and its multiples.

However, Pollux' second claim (7.170), i. e. that the term κέρμα is not common in singular, is not supported by our evidence. On the contrary, the overall frequency of singular cases is slightly higher. Within Comedy in particular, apart from Amphis' fragment, κέρμα in singular occurs four more times: Theopomp. fr. 31.2, Antiph. fr. 129.1, Alex. fr. 133.7, and Eub. fr. 67.7 (= fr. 82.7); and there are also three occurrences of the diminutive κερμάτιον: Philippid. fr. 23.2, and Men. Her. 7 and 33. Κέρματα in plural is found in Ar. Av. 1108 and Pl. 379, Eub. fr. 82.1, and Diph. fr. 67.13.

μικρὸν κέρμα It is likely that this is part of a financial transaction; yet, the context is beyond recovery: this could be a past, present, or future transaction; the speaker may be the seller, the buyer, or some third party; and the object of the transaction remains equally unknown. All we know is that this is a low-priced item/service. The possibilities are practically infinite. Nevertheless, one possibility deserves to be noted here. Within Middle and New Comedy there is a recurring topos that consists of comic characters engaging in a monetary transaction or visualising one, whilst specifically denominating the price; stereotypically, the object of the transaction is either a hetaira or a market good (usually fish): e. g. Amphis fr. 30 (fish), Antiph. frr. 145

(fish) and 293 (hetaira), Eub. frr. 67 and 82 (hetaira), Alex. frr. 15 and 16 (fish), Diph. fr. 67 (fish), Men. Epit. 136–137 (hetaira), Macho fr. 18.450–455 (hetaira), etc. Within this topos of financial transactions fish is universally assigned a preposterously high price and the comic characters constantly resent the fishmongers for that (e. g. Alex. fr. 204, Diph. fr. 32). On the contrary, hetairai are periodically mentioned as a cheap ware. Mostly relevant to Amphis' current case is Eubulus fr. 82, which sets off by describing hetairai as φιλῳδοὺς κερμάτων παλευτρίας (song-loving decoy-birds who lure in coins), and ends (ll. 6–7) using the same terms with Amphis' fragment: ἔξεστί σοι/μικροῦ πρίασθαι κέρματος τὴν ἡδονήν (it is possible to buy pleasure for a few coins/ at a low price). Remarkably, another fragment by Eubulus features the same line again: μικροῦ πρίασθαι κέρματος τὴν ἡδονήν (fr. 67.7).

Unlike Middle and New, in Old Comedy money is predominantly mentioned in a different context, i. e. in relation to state salaries paid to jurors (Ar. V. 606), ambassadors (Ar. Ach. 66), mercenaries (Ar. Ach. 159), and other public officials and functionaries (e. g. fleet-rowers: Ar. Eq. 1366–1367). References of this nature are practically non-existent in the surviving evidence from both Middle and New Comedy; in fact, the only instance is Theophil. fr. 12 where the theoric fund (θεωρικόν) is mentioned.

Overall, although certainty is impossible, a discussion about purchasing a hetaira's services could be the context for Amphis' fragment. If so, this hetaira must have been a brothel worker, like the ones mentioned by Eub. frr. 67 and 82; and not, say, a grand hetaira like the notorious Phryne (cf. Timocl. fr. 25) or Theodote (cf. X. Mem. 3.11.1–18), who could afford to be picky with their clients.

Ἀμφικράτης (Amphicratēs)
("Amphicratēs")

Date ca. 350–340 BC

Discussion Edmonds 2,314f.; PCG 2,215; Papachrysostomou 38–39

Title The identity of the title figure cannot be established with certainty. It could be (i) an overt and direct stage presentation of some historical character called Amphicrates, (ii) a comic disguise for a real, contemporary person who had a different name in real life (including Amphis himself), or (iii) an entirely fictitious character. There are enough parallels to support all three possibilities.

Regarding possibility (i), Amphicrates is a fairly common Attic name; cf. the numerous entries in PA (seven), PAA (eleven) and LGPN 1,34 (fifteen). However, the necessity for a topical theme/character narrows our options down to the following two contemporary figures:[4] (a) Amphicrates, the Athenian captain killed during the expedition of the Ten Thousand (X. An. 4.2.13, 4.2.17), and (b) Amphicrates, the mid-fourth century BC Athenian architect / ship builder (PA 769). Theoretically, Amphis' play could revolve around and/or attack either of these two historical figures. Parallel to this interpretation would be Plato's Hyperbolus (PCG 7,505–508; the homonymous politician) and Cleophon (PCG 7,456–458; the homonymous general), as well as Aristopho's Plato (PCG 4,6; the well-known philosopher) and Philonides (PCG 4,10f.; a famous bon viveur). Additionally, though not a title figure, the bon viveur Callias is the named target in Eupolis' Kolakes (PCG 5,380–399).

Possibility (ii) entails again a satire of a contemporary character, but this character is now disguised under the invented sobriquet "Amphicrates"; cf. the parallel cases of Eupolis' Marikas (PCG 5,399–424; the title figure standing for Hyperbolus), and Aristophanes' Knights (where Paphlagon stands for Cleon). However, in our case, given the total lack of any relevant information (e. g. from scholia, etc.), we are in complete darkness regarding to whom this invented name was meant to allude. Possibility (ii) could alternatively accommodate a poetic disguise of the playwright Amphis himself, given that the name Amphis can be a hypocoristic of Amphicrates (cf. Intro. 1). Cratinus' portrayal of himself in Pytine (PCG 4,219–232), along with Aristophanes' numerous passing references to himself (e. g. Ach. 377–382, Eq. 507–550, Nu. 518–562, etc.) would be the obvious antecedents. Likewise, Amphis could have put himself on stage in a self-presentatory play, probably brimming with self-satire; e. g. featuring poet's own – both real and imaginary and/or exaggerated – weird habits, physical flaws, sexual predilections, etc. Cf. Papachrysostomou 2012-2013b.

[4] Evidently, a character from the remote past (e. g. Amphicrates, the seventh century BC king of Samos; cf. Hdt. 3.59) would naturally constitute a non-topical and thus unappealing subject for a comic play.

Possibility (iii) allows for an entirely fictitious and invented character as the play's protagonist; this scenario would be paralleled by two further comic plays that feature otherwise unknown and unidentifiable figures in their titles: Amphis' Dexidemides (PCG 2,218f.) and Aristopho's Kallonides (PCG 4,4). See Sommerstein (1996b) 334–335 and Papachrysostomou (2008) 112–115. After all, resourcefulness, fiction, and fantasy are stereotypical and generic attributes of Comedy; cf. Ruffell (2011) 29–53.

The one surviving fragment offers no conclusive basis for a clear choice between the three possibilities mentioned above.

Date Webster (1952: 17–18) categorises Amphicrates among the "plays which mention Plato as alive". Instead, I believe that the present reference to Plato and to his notion of the Good (ἀγαθόν) are inconclusive as to whether Plato was alive or not at the time of the performance. Be that as it may, this reference can still prove useful in helping us establish a rough date for the play. Below (comm. on l. 3a) I suggest that the play relates to the lecture On the Good (Περὶ τἀγαθοῦ) that Plato gave late in his life. If so, the play must have been performed soon after the delivery of this lecture, since the reference to Plato's Good obviously intended to ring a bell among the audience by recalling recent memories and experiences. Given the date of Plato's death (348/7 BC), it is reasonable to assume that the play was produced sometime between ca. 350 and 340 BC.

fr. 6 (6 K.)

τὸ δ' ἀγαθὸν ὅ τι ποτ' ἐστίν, οὗ σὺ τυγχάνειν μέλλεις διὰ ταύτην, ἧττον οἶδα τοῦτ' ἐγώ, ὦ δέσποτ', ἢ τὸ Πλάτωνος ἀγαθόν. (B.) πρόσεχε δή

3 ὦ PF: ὡς B

And as for whatever benefit you are likely to get through her, I know less about that, master, than about Plato's Good. (B.) Pay attention

D.L. 3.26
φησὶ δ' Ἡρακλείδης ὅτι νέος ὢν οὕτως ἦν αἰδήμων καὶ κόσμιος ὥστε μηδέποτε ὀφθῆναι γελῶν ὑπεράγαν· τοιοῦτος δ' ὢν ὅμως ἐσκώφθη καὶ αὐτὸς ὑπὸ τῶν κωμικῶν.

according to Heraclides, when he [i. e. Plato] was young, he was so modest and well-behaved that he had never been seen laughing overmuch; however, despite being such as this, he too was mocked by the comic playwrights.

D.L. 3.27
Ἄμφις Ἀμφικράτει· τὸ ⏑⏑ δή.

Amphis in Amphicratēs: "And ⏑⏑ attention".

Metre Iambic trimeter

1. ⏑⏑⏑⏑⏑⏑ ⏑–⏑|– ⏑–⏑– (hephthemimeral caesura)
2. ––⏑⏑– –|–⏑– ⏑–⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
3. ––⏑|– ⏑⏑–⏑⏑⏑ –⏑⏑⏑– (triemimeral caesura)

Discussion Meineke 3,302; Bothe 481; Kock 2,237; PCG 2,216; Papachrysostomou 39–42

Citation Context Diogenes Laertius dedicates Book 3 of his Vitae Philosophorum to Plato. In the beginning of chapter 26 Diogenes points out that Plato did not escape the comic gibe and subesequently produces an exhaustive catalogue of comic passages (3.26–28) that target Plato's philosophy as well as various aspects of the philosopher's personality, e. g. his habits. It cannot be verified whether this whole part on Plato and Comedy is an excerpt from Heraclides Lembus (the second century BC historian and epitomizer; FHG iii.167–171). But it appears that the information drawn from Heraclides ends at ὑπεράγαν, and Diogenes seems to resume his own narrative after the semicolon. Immediately after the present fragment, Diogenes quotes another fragment by Amphis dealing with Plato, fr. 13 (ubi vide). It should be noted that in the composition of his Vitae Diogenes made extensive use of excerpts gathered by himself and used his numerous sources both directly and indirectly; on the issue of Diogenes' sources see further Mejer 1978.

Constitution of Text For the manuscript tradition of Diogenes Laertius and the quality of the surviving codices see Intro. 3 ("Tradition & Reception"). In l. 3 the correct reading ὦ (indispensable for the vocative ὦ δέσποτ') is preserved by codices P and F, whereas codex B (considered by Marcovich (1999: xii) to be the best) preserves the erroneous reading ὡς.

Interpretation The fragment is part of a dialogue between a slave and his master (cf. ὦ δέσποτ'). The subject of their conversation is probably a woman (cf. ταύτην), either a hetaira or a maiden. The master is about to act, in order – understandably – to win this woman for himself. The slave, however, has reservations, which the master tries to allay. This discussion could perhaps be a preamble to a venture that was actually undertaken later in the play. See Olson (2007) 229, 238–243.

What is distinctively remarkable here is that this is an outspoken slave, who considers it appropriate to boldly intervene in his master's affairs; and, surprisingly enough, the master finds it worth his time to explain the situation to him. Outspoken slaves with a strong personality already appear in late Aristophanes; see Dover (1993) 43–50. In Frogs Xanthias dominates Dionysus for the most part, and this kind of relationship paves the way for the striking dynamic (that looks more like a friendly liaison) between master and slave in Wealth, where at the beginning of the play Chremylus is practically forced to outline the situation to Carion, who otherwise refuses to stop pestering him (ll. 23–24 οὐ γὰρ παύσομαι / πρὶν ἂν φράσῃς μοι τίς ποτ' ἐστὶν οὑτοσί : I won't give up until you tell me who this fellow is). Similarly dominant and overconfident slaves can be detected, albeit sporadically, within the fragmentary evidence of Middle Comedy; e. g. [Alex.] fr. 25 (cf. Arnott 1996: 819–830), Ephipp. fr. 15. Later in Menander the resourceful, occasionally presumptuous and / or cunning slave becomes a stock character; cf. e. g. how in Dyscolus 183–184 Sostratus desperately seeks the craftiness of the slave Getas, since the latter ἔχει τι διάπυρον καὶ πραγμάτων / ἔμπειρός ἐστι παντοδαπῶν (he's a ball of fire, experienced in all kinds of things). For the slave figure in Greek Comedy in general see Akrigg & Tordoff (2013) passim; for particularly Middle Comedy see Nesselrath (1990) 283–296; and for slaves in Menander see MacCary 1969, Krieter-Spiro (1997) passim, but esp. 14–43, 83–87, 160–162; Konstan 2013.

1a τὸ ἀγαθόν The astute slave engages in witty word-play, as he juxtaposes the good (benefit) to be expected from the woman in question with Plato's Good that he uses in a proverbial / colloquial way (cf. comm. on l. 3a). The first occurrence of the term ἀγαθόν in line 1 lacks any philosophical nuances and designates instead some entirely practical and material benefit, probably with some additional connotations of sexual pleasure. Its juxtaposition with Plato's Good in l. 3 brings forward the slave's puzzlement and irritation in view of his master's intentions / actions / feelings. The slave cannot understand the good to be expected from this woman any better than he understands Plato's philosophy.

Apart from Amphis' fragment, there are two further fragments that mention Plato's Good within a satirical context: Alex. fr. 98.1–3 ἐγὼ / κἂν μὴ παραθῶσι θερμά. τἀγαθὸν Πλάτων / ἁπανταχοῦ φησ' ἀγαθὸν εἶναι (I for one [will come/eat], even if they don't serve warm food; Plato claims that the Good is good everywhere); and Philippid. fr. 6.1–2 μὴ γαμεῖν, ζῆν δ' ἡδέως. / τὸ Πλάτωνος ἀγαθὸν δ' ἐστὶ τοῦτο (not to marry and live your life pleasantly; this is Plato's Good). Additionally, Hegesipp.Com. fr. 2, Philem. fr. 74, and Bato fr. 3 refer to the notion of the Good (albeit without mentioning Plato's name) and to the philosophers' unremitting and zealous attempts to establish its real nature. See Weiher (1913) 48.

Outside Plato the term ἀγαθόν normally refers to some practical or material benefit, without any philosophical sense; e. g. Th. 3.68.1, X. Cyr. 5.3.20, Isoc. 16.50, Ar. Nu. 1062, Antiph. fr. 246, etc.

1b ὅ τι ποτ' ἐστίν The combination of ποτέ with the indefinite relative pronoun ὅ τι results in a dismissive way of speaking, which emphasises the slave's indignation, aggressiveness and disrespectfulness towards his master. For the use of ποτέ with interrogatives to give an emphatic tenor to the speech, see Smyth (1956) §346c.

2 διὰ ταύτην To the audience the reference will have been obvious; either it refers to someone or something visible to them or it resumes an antecedent noun previously mentioned. Nesselrath (1990: 294, n. 24) believes that the deictic pronoun refers to a woman, who has been occupying the master's mind. This could be either a hetaira or a free maiden, whom the master would like either to marry or to establish an erotic relationship with. But Kock (2,237) offers an alternative reconstruction; he thinks that ταύτην refers to philosophy. If so, this might suggest that philosophy played a significant role in the plot of the play. Though certainty is impossible I would opt for Nesselrath's rather than Kock's interpretation, given the increased interest of Middle Comedy in hetairai and women in general.[5] Besides, the issue of advantage / benefits to be expected from a hetaira is also the topic of Amphis fr. 1 (cf. comm. ad loc.).

3a τὸ Πλάτωνος ἀγαθόν The notion of the Good is a central one in Plato's philosophy; the relevant bibliography is vast; see Shorey 1977; Dorter (1994) 24–26, 231–235, 238–243, Irwin (1995) 318–319, 332–337; Hobbs (2000) 220–230; Lodge (^{2}2000) 343–477; Desjardins (2004) passim.

---

[5] Cf. the plethora of plays (from both Middle and New Comedy) featuring a female name or ethnic in their titles; e. g. Ἀκκώ by Amphis, Ἀτθίς, Ἀχαΐς, and Κλεοβουλίνη by Alexis, Ἀμπρακιῶτις, Λοκρίδες, and Σαμία by Anaxandrides, Νεοττίς by Anaxilas, Antiphanes, and Eubulus, Μαλθάκη by Antiphanes, Φίλιννα by Axionicus, Θαΐς and Φάνιον by Menander, Παλλακίς by Menander and Diphilus, etc. Additionally, several other fragments mention a number of hetairai (mostly historical, though there are also some fictitious names); e. g. Anaxandr. fr. 9, Philetaer. fr. 9, Theophil. fr. 11, etc.

The slave of the fragment claims to have no idea of what the Platonic Good is, and employs this phrase in a proverbial way to express his overall ignorance and perplexity about the benefit that is to be expected from the woman in question. Indeed, as first advocated by Fenk (1913: 45) and later sustained further by Imperio (1998: 127), the concept of Platonic Good was widely used in fourth century Athens (and beyond) as a proverbial expression, a slogan, to indicate the absolute obscurity and incomprehensibility of an issue and/or one's own complete ignorance about something.

Within the Platonic corpus the nature of ἀγαθόν is under constant discussion and meticulous examination. Among others, it appears to equal ἡδονή – pleasure (Phlb. 11b, Grg. 495a-b) and σοφία – wisdom (Euthd. 281e). But despite the vast number of references to it in the surviving works of Plato, one cannot easily discern Plato's own conviction about this notion, since the relevant passages provide us with the views of either Socrates or his collocutors. It is likely that Plato's own views were presented in a series of lectures on the Good that Plato delivered within the Academy, in front of his disciples only; this is the reason why Simplicius speaks in the plural of λόγοι (in Ph. 453.28, 503.12) and συνουσίαι (ibid. 542.10, 545.24). But on a single occasion Plato gave a public lecture that left a lasting impression on the Athenians. This lecture, now lost, was entitled Περὶ τἀγαθοῦ (On the Good), and this is to what the current phrase τὸ Πλάτωνος ἀγαθόν must refer. On this lecture see further Ross (1951) 147–149; Gaiser (1963) 451–455; Id. (1980) passim, esp. 8–11, 25; Riginos (1976) 124–126; Desjardins (2004) 119–127; Gilbert 2012. Plato's Seventh Letter (ca. 355 BC) seems unaware of this lecture (cf. 341d-e; Gaiser 1980: 17–19); hence, the lecture On the Good must have been delivered between 355 BC and Plato's death (348/7 BC).

This lecture dazzled and confused the majority of the listeners, who were unprepared for its content; cf. Aristox. Harm. 39–40: καθάπερ Ἀριστοτέλης ἀεὶ διηγεῖτο τοὺς πλείστους τῶν ἀκουσάντων παρὰ Πλάτωνος τὴν περὶ τἀγαθοῦ ἀκρόασιν παθεῖν. προσιέναι μὲν γὰρ ἕκαστον ὑπολαμβάνοντα λήψεσθαί τι τῶν νομιζομένων τούτων ἀνθρωπίνων ἀγαθῶν οἷον πλοῦτον ὑγίειαν ἰσχὺν τὸ ὅλον εὐδαιμονίαν τινὰ θαυμαστήν. ὅτε δὲ φανείησαν οἱ λόγοι περὶ μαθημάτων καὶ ἀριθμῶν καὶ γεωμετρίας καὶ ἀστρολογίας καὶ τὸ πέρας ὅτι ἀγαθόν ἐστιν ἕν, παντελῶς οἶμαι παράδοξόν τι ἐφαίνετο αὐτοῖς. εἶθ' οἱ μὲν κατεφρόνουν τοῦ πράγματος οἱ δὲ κατεμέμφοντο (just as Aristotle always used to narrate what happened to most people that listened to Plato's lecture On the Good. For they had all arrived assuming they would learn something about the things commonly considered as 'good things' among humans, like wealth, health, power, and generally about some marvelous happiness. But when the lecture turned out to be about sciences and numbers and geometry and astronomy and, to cut a long story short, that the Good is just one, this, I believe, appeared to be utterly preposterous to them. Hence some despised the lecture, while others censured it); cf. Arist. MM 1182ᵃ25–30.

As far as the comic genre is concerned, the philosopher figure is one of Middle Comedy's favourite targets (just like it was Old Comedy's too), and this period's enfant terrible is Plato, who succeeds Socrates as the primary philosophical figure to be mocked; see Weiher (1914) 37–55, Webster (^{2}1970) 50–56, Arnott (1996) 49–51. For an exhaustive list of anecdotes concerning the life, writings, and teachings of Plato see Riginos 1976.

But what is fascinating is that during the period of Middle Comedy we witness a fundamental change in the essence of the parody of the philosopher figure and of the way in which this parody is formulated. Middle Comedy fragments do not convey the same anxiety and hostility against philosophy, as the Old Comedy plays did. Severe accusations, such as those of alazoneia and impiety that are cast against Socrates in Aristophanes' Clouds and Amipsias' Connus (PCG 2,200–203; cf. Orth 2013: 213–248) and against Protagoras in Eupolis' Kolakes (cf. Carey 2000: 419–436), appear very sporadically within Middle Comedy; instead, during this latter period the satire tends to focus on the philosophers' destitution and fake asceticism (e. g. Aristopho frr. 9, 10, 12), and their weird personal habits (e. g. Anaxandr. fr. 20, Alex. fr. 151), and is largely innocuous even when it deals with philosophical tenets, e. g. Amphis' present fragment, Alex. fr. 163, Cratin.Jun. fr. 10; cf. Olson (2007) 227–255. The reasons for this change are not difficult to detect. The fourth century sees an increased interest in philosophy and the philosophical tenets themselves. By a "trickle down" process philosophy becomes part of the fabric of the society to the extent that playwrights writing for mass audiences can expect their spectators to know certain basic concepts, without having necessarily read e. g. their Plato in the original. See Imperio (1998) 120–130.

It is within such a socio-intellectual milieu that we need to locate and interpret the reference to Plato in this fragment. The mid-fourth century lecture On the Good must have further incited the interest of the public, which was already familiar – in an indeterminate and variable degree – with Platonic philosophy in general and particularly with the multifaceted nature of the Good in Plato's published works.

3b πρόσεχε δή A case of antilabe. The master impatiently interrupts his slave in his urge to lay out his reasoning. The particle δή occasionally follows the verb προσέχω in the imperative, in order to add emphasis; e. g. Alex. fr. 274.2, Pl. Plt. 259d, Id. Lg. 783e; cf. Denniston (1954) 204, 214–218. The verb προσέχω, when meaning pay attention, is most commonly followed by τὸν νοῦν, in both poetry and prose; e. g. Ar. Eq. 1064, Id. Pax 174, Pherecr. fr. 163.3, Antiph. fr. 57.2, D. 4.3, Isoc. 18.42, etc.; cf. LSJ[9] s. v. 3. Therefore, it is reasonable to assume that the following line of Amphis' fragment began with τὸν νοῦν, a reading which also scans correctly at the beginning of an iambic metre (x –).

Βαλανεῖον (Balaneion)
("The Bathhouse")

Discussion PCG 2,216; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 295

Title Comic plays featuring a locus in their title make up a distinct category. Apart from Amphis' present play, we know of two more Balaneion plays, one by Timocles (PCG 7,755f.) and one by Diphilus (PCG 5,61); in addition, Alcaeus wrote a play called Palaestra (The Wrestling-school; PCG 2,10f.; the alternative possibility of Palaestra being a hetaira's name is also considered by Orth 2013: 108–119), and Antiphanes a Mylōn (The Mill-house; PCG 2,399). Obviously, each of these loci was – for various reasons – of crucial importance for the plot.

Bathhouses – on account of the hot water they provided – were commonly associated with a luxurious and hedonistic lifestyle and were considered a main cause of debauchery and moral corruption; cf. Plu. 127e-131d. Within Comedy this attitude is remarkably manifest in Aristophanes' Clouds, where bathhouses constitute a major issue of controversy between the Better and the Worse Argument: 1044–1046 (1046: κάκιστόν ἐστι καὶ δειλὸν ποιεῖ τὸν ἄνδρα – (hot baths) are utterly bad and turn a man into a coward), 834–837, 991. Most revealing is also the adesp. com. fr. 133 ὧν ἐστι τὸ ζῆν οὐδὲν ἄλλ' ἢ κραιπάλη, / κῶμος, βαλανεῖ', ἄκρατος, ἀμίδες, ἀργία, πότος (whose life consists of nothing else than drinking-bouts, revels, bathhouses, unmixed wine, chamberpots, laziness, carousal); cf. Hermipp. fr. 68. In Aristophanes' Frogs 710–713 a certain resentment is registered against the profession of the bathman (on which see further Olson 1998: 279–280): ὁ πονηρότατος βαλανεὺς ὁπόσοι / κρατοῦσι κυκησίτεφροι / ψευδολίτρου τε κονίας / καὶ Κιμωλίας γῆς (the basest bathman of all the ash-mixers who lord it over fake washing soda and fuller's earth). Similarly, in [D.] 50.35 bathing (λοῦσθαι ἐν βαλανείῳ) is registered as a major symptom of marines' corruption. For thorough discussions of public baths see Ginouvès (1962) 183–229; Yegül 1992; Weber 1996; Killebrew 1997; Hoffmann 1999; Winter (2006) 115–134; Trümper 2013. For a catalogue, a map, and detailed plans of all major Greek public baths throughout the Mediterranean see Lucore & Trümper (2013) 264–333.

However, it is striking that such lambasting comments are entirely absent from what survives of Middle and New Comedy. Interestingly, we have three plays entitled The Bathhouse, which obviously featured a bathhouse as the epicentre of their plot, along with a fascinating fragment by Apollodorus Carystius (fr. 5) where the speaker dreams of a peaceful and luxury-indulging society, where all Athenians under the age of thirty would spend their time drinking (19–20), and the allies would proceed to the bathhouse, whilst the Euboeans would mix the wine (24–25). The content of Antiph. fr. 239 is hastily misjudged by Athenaeus 1.18c (ὧν τὸ βλαπτικὸν Ἀντιφάνης δηλοῖ – Antiphanes reveals the damage bathhouses do); the speaker of this fragment simply whines about the bathhouse's scorching water that almost peeled his skin off; cf. Crusius (1888) 610.

Unlike what is usually the case, in a welcome surprise the single line that survives from Amphis' play has a direct thematic connection with the title and provides us with a (reported) snapshot from a bathhouse with two individuals requesting hot water. But it is simply impossible to establish with certainty the kind of plot in which such a scene was accommodated. We can only presume that, since the entire play was named after a bathhouse, this establishment must have played a key role in the plot, e. g. perhaps as a meeting place of the play's main characters.

fr. 7 (7 K.)

ἀνεβόησ' ὕδωρ ἐνεγκεῖν θερμόν, ἄλλος μετάκερας ἀνεβόησ' Dindorf: -σεν A

(Someone) cried out in demand for some hot water and another for some lukewarm

Ath. 3.123d-e
τὸ δὲ χλιαρὸν ὕδωρ Ἀθηναῖοι μετάκερας καλοῦσιν … Ἄμφις δ' ἐν Βαλανείῳ· ἀνεβόησ' — μετάκερας

The Athenians call lukewarm water 'metakeras' … Amphis in "The Bathhouse": "(Someone) cried — lukewarm".

Metre Trochaic tetrameter catalectic
⏑⏑⏑–⏑ –⏑––|–⏑–⏑ ⏑⏑⏑–

Discussion Meineke 3,303; Bothe 481; Kock 2,237; Edmonds 2,316f.; PCG 2,216; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 295

Citation Context After the consumption of saltfish (3.120b), the banqueters develop a desire for drink and they soon start discussing whether the ancients used water and of what temperature in their toasts (3.123a). Within this context Cynulcus, as the polymath he is, tells his fellow-drinkers about the term μετάκερας, which the ancient Athenians used to define lukewarm water (the same information is also given at 2.41d) and continues by quoting Alex. fr. 141 along with Amphis' present fragment as examples. He also mentions the occurrence of this term in Sophil. fr. 1 and Philem. fr. 40.

Constitution of Text Athenaeus' codex A preserves the reading ἀνεβόησεν, which renders the line unmetrical (there is one extra syllable). Dindorf's correction ἀνεβόησ' restores metrical soundness, by precisely removing that one extra syllable.

Interpretation The fragment is part of a narrative describing events that have already taken place off-stage. The speaker excitedly reports an episode that he has recently witnessed taking place in a bathhouse. He is now informing either the audience, through a monologue, or some fellow comic character(s). The speaker's identity can only be guessed; he may be a slave who had accompanied his master to the bathhouse or a free citizen who happened to be there at the time. The speaker mentions two individuals: individual A is the subject of ἀνεβόησ' and individual B is the ἄλλος. However, the presence of the indefinite pronoun ἄλλος clearly shows that these two bathing individuals are not known by either the audience or the speaker's collocutor, at least not as yet. On the contrary, if these characters were already known, the indefinite pronoun ἕτερος would have been used, accompanied with the definite article ὁ, as in ὁ ἕτερος (instead of ἄλλος). The surviving part of narrative captures the moment when these two individuals address either the bathman or some slave attendant asking for their preferred mixture of water. Giving orders to slaves or instructions to assistants (in either direct or reported speech) constitutes a typical scene within Comedy; e. g. Ar. Ach. 1096–1142, Amphis frr. 27 and 35 (ubi vide), Anaxipp. fr. 6, Antiph. fr. 221, Dionys.Com. fr. 3, Ephipp. fr. 15, Mnesim. fr. 4 (cf. Papachrysostomou 2008: 186–209), Nicostr.Com. fr. 4, Sophil. fr. 5, Men. fr. 2, etc.

The asyndeton of the line is the first of three pieces of evidence (the other two being the trochaic tetrameter and the verb ἀνεβόησ') strongly suggesting that the speaker talks hurriedly and is in a heightened emotional state, just as individual A probably is too. It is possible that the event the speaker is set to describe had somehow caused pandemonium in the bathhouse. Such uproars are regularly reported in Comedy; cf. Mnesim. fr. 4, esp. the asyndeton of ll. 52–55: πᾶς δὲ κατ' οἴκους μάττει, πέττει, / τίλλει, κόπτει, τέμνει, δεύει, / χαίρει, παίζει, πηδᾷ, δειπνεῖ, / πίνει, σκιρτᾷ, λορδοῖ, κεντεῖ (everyone in the house is kneading, cooking, plucking, chopping, cutting up, drenching, rejoicing, playing, leaping, dining, drinking, frisking, bending backwards, pricking); and the papyric adesp. com. fr. 1018, which though badly mutilated features quasi-similar language (ll. 8–9, 14–16): "α]ὐλητρίδ' ἡμῖν ἀγάγετε" /]η βαλανεῖόν ἐστί που

… "ὄνος π]ροσέρχετ'." εὐθὺς ἄλλος ἀνέκραγεν / ἕ]τερος πάλιν "ὄνος προσέρχεται" /]ν ἄλλος "τὸ βαλανεῖόν ἐστ' ὄνος" ("bring us a flute-girl" […] there is a bathhouse somewhere … "there comes an ass", someone cried out loud immediately, and then someone else again "there comes an ass" … someone else "the bathhouse is the ass").

Metre Regarding the metre of this fragment, this is one of two distinctive cases within Amphis' corpus (the other being fr. 8, ubi vide) where, instead of the iambic trimeter, the trochaic tetrameter catalectic is used. A probable reason for this is the speaker's emotional agitation (on account of the news he is reporting; cf. the asyndeton of the line and the presence of ἀνεβόησ'). Indeed, in Middle Comedy the trochaic tetrameter is mainly used to communicate the speaker's heightened emotional state; in the form of exuberant proclamations (Aristopho fr. 13), passionate outbursts (Alex. fr. 103 with Arnott 1996: 268–269, Anaxil. fr. 22, Philetaer. fr. 9) or programmatic statements (Aristopho fr. 5). In Aristophanic Comedy the trochaic tetrameter is the standard metre for the Aristophanic epirrhematic syzygy, where topical issues are discussed. In addition, the trochee's running effect (cf. Arist. Rh. 1409[a]1: τροχερὸς ῥυθμός) is commonly used for the storming entry of chorus (e. g. Ar. Ach. 204–207, 219–222, Eq. 242–283, Pax 299–338, Av. 268–304), but is also largely exploited in cases where the lyric "springs directly from the action" (Parker 1997: 38), in the form of comments on the action and / or as (self-)exhortations (e. g. Ar. Th. 520–530, Ra. 895–904). See White (1912) §245; Parker (1997) 35–40, 124–125; cf. Zimmermann's thorough treatment of the Aristophanic parodoi (1984: 34–149). Concerning Menander and New Comedy, Handley detects a pattern of "speeches of self-description" (1965: 252), which are regularly delivered in trochaic tetrameters; e. g. Dysc. 57–68 and 708–747, Diph. fr. 23, Philem. fr. 178. See Handley (1965) 140–142, 251–253; Dedoussi 1961. In tragedy the trochaic tetrameter is generally reserved for passages where some special effect, intense emotions or otherwise crucial notions and ideas need to be communicated to the audience; see Drew-Bear 1968.

ἀνεβόησ' The verb ἀναβοάω means "cry, shout aloud, esp. in sign of grief or astonishment" (LSJ[9] s. v.). Its presence supplements our other evidence (asyndeton with trochaic tetrameter) and further substantiates the original hypothesis that this is an emotionally charged lemma. The emotional element originates from the person featuring in the reported scene (the subject of ἀνεβόησ'), but it is also probably shared with the speaker of the fragment (who opts for asyndeton and the trochaic tetrameter).

The usage of ἀνεβόησ' here is meant to describe the compelling nature of the request / order addressed to the bathman or the slave attendant. It is noteworthy that the verb ἀναβοάω is similarly used elsewhere in cases where orders are delivered to slaves, since such passages (like Amphis' fragment) contain the element of compelling necessity and / or excitement; e. g. Sophil. fr. 5: "οὐχὶ δώδεκα / κυάθους" ἀνεβόησέν τις "ὑποχεῖς; κωμάσαι / πρὸς τὴν Ταναγρικὴν δεῖ γάρ" ("pour a dozen ladlefuls, will you?", somebody shouted, "for we need to get drunk and go visit the girl from Tanagra"), Men. fr. 2: ὀκτώ τις ὑποχεῖν ἀνεβόα καὶ δώδεκα / κυάθους (someone kept shouting to pour eight ladlefuls and then again twelve). For usages in a different context but with similar implications of passionate astonishment, excitement, and other emotional agitation see Hdt. 7.18, E. Ba. 731, Plu. Sol. 28.3, Luc. JTr. 41, etc.

μετάκερας This is an extremely rare adjective of one ending (i. e. ὁ / ἡ / τὸ μετάκερας), which derives from the verb μετακεράννυμι (LSJ[9] s. v. mix by pouring from one vessel into another). It means intermixed and is exclusively used with relation to water to signify the lukewarm / tepid water. Athenaeus tells us twice (2.41d drawing on Eratosthenes, and 3.123d) that this is how the Athenians called lukewarm water. But strangely enough the term occurs only sporadically and only in later Comedy. It is always used substantively (i. e. the noun ὕδωρ is omitted). In our fragment lukewarm water (μετάκερας) is clearly differentiated from hot water (θερμόν). The same antithesis is also drawn in Alex. fr. 141 αἱ δὲ παῖδες παρέχεον / ἡ μὲν τὸ θερμόν, ἡ δ' ἑτέρα <τὸ> μετάκερας (one of the slave-girls was pouring in hot water, the other one lukewarm). Additionally, Athenaeus 3.123d-e attests to the occurrence of this term in two further comic playwrights, Sophilus (fr. 1) and Philemo (fr. 40), but unfortunately does not preserve the frame of reference in either case. A similarly isolated instance is Philyll. fr. 32 (cf. Orth 2015: 263–264). Outside Comedy, instead of μετάκερας, we come across the synonymous term μετακέρασμα; e. g. Hp. Acut. 18.15, Plu. 951e.

Γυναικοκρατία (Gynaikokratia)
("Female Dominion")

Discussion Meineke 1,405; Bothe 481; Kock 2,238; PCG 2,216; Papachrysostomou 42–44

Title This is another shared play-title between Amphis and Alexis (cf. Intro. 8, and Arnott 1996: 151–153); and these are the only two plays we have bearing this intriguing title. Γυναικοκρατία could be interpreted in either political or domestic terms. If political, it would translate as gynaecocracy, i. e. regime of women, in which case Aristophanes' Ecclesiazusae would be the obvious antecedent. If domestic, it would translate as control by a woman/women; such a play may have focused on just a couple, featuring e. g. a henpecked husband and an authoritarian wife. Alternatively, the two realms, political and domestic, may have somehow combined in the play; there is indeed an interesting passage in Aristotle's Politics (1313^{b}32–38) where domestic gynaecocracy (γυναικοκρατία περὶ τὰς οἰκίας) is described as a symptom of dissolute democracy foreshadowing tyranny.

Böttiger (1837–1838: 1,300ff.) and Meineke (1,398f.) firmly believe that both Γυναικοκρατία-plays were either adaptations or imitations of the Ecclesiazusae. However, the available evidence is meagre, and the connection with Aristophanes' play, though highly probable, remains uncertain. All that can be said with certainty is that in the Γυναικοκρατία-plays one or more women transcended (to an irretrievable extent) the boundaries of their traditional roles and duties. Unfortunately, the content of the one surviving fragment from Amphis' current play cannot point us confidently in any direction.

On gynaecocracy in Greek literature see Willetts 1959; Pembroke 1967; Tyrrell 1982. See also Amphis fr. 1 "Interpretation" for further bibliography on women in general.

fr. 8 (8 K.)

πῖνε, παῖζε· θνητὸς ὁ βίος, ὀλίγος οὐπὶ γῇ χρόνος· ἀθάνατος ὁ θάνατός ἐστιν, ἂν ἅπαξ τις ἀποθάνῃ

2 ἀθάνατος ὁ θάνατος Elmsley (1809) ad Ar. Ach. 47: θάν- δ' ὁ θάν- ACE Drink! Have fun! Life is mortal, short is the time on earth.

Death is unending, once one dies

Ath. 8.336c
καὶ ἐν τῇ ἐπιγραφομένῃ δὲ Γυναικοκρατίᾳ (poet. et fab. nom. om. CE) τὰ ὅμοια λέγει· πῖνε — ἀποθάνῃ.

He (sc. Amphis) makes similar remarks too in his play entitled "Female dominion": "Drink! — dies".

Metre Trochaic tetrameter catalectic

1. –⏑–⏑ –⏑⏑⏑⏑|⏑⏑⏑–⏑ –⏑–
2. –⏑⏑⏑⏑ ⏑⏑⏑–⏑|–⏑–⏑ ⏑⏑⏑–

Discussion Meineke 3,303; Bothe 481; Kock 2,238; PCG 2,216f.; Papachrysostomou 42–44

Citation Context The present fragment features in Book 8 of Athenaeus' Deipnosophistae. It is quoted by the banqueter Democritus in a discussion about the Assyrian king Ashurbanipal (in Greek Σαρδανάπαλλος; Sardanapallus), his stern awareness of human mortality and his ensuant hedonistic lifestyle (Ath. 8.335e sqq.). Prompted by the inscription reportedly featuring on Ashurbanipal's tomb (εὖ εἰδὼς ὅτι θνητὸς ἔφυς σὸν θυμὸν ἄεξε / τερπόμενος θαλίῃσι· θανόντι σοι οὔτις ὄνησις – knowing that you are mortal, live it up and enjoy yourself with feasts; for there won't be any pleasures for you, once you are dead; 8.336a), Democritus proceeds by quoting a number of passages that convey a quasi-similar carpe diem message. Amongst them there feature two fragments of Amphis, fr. 21 (ubi vide) and the present fragment (immediately following fr. 21), along with Alex. fr. 25 (though, believably, this fragment is falsely attributed to Alexis; cf. Arnott 1996: 819–830). The message is universal: seize the moment and enjoy yourself in every possible way, for life is short.

Constitution of Text The Epitome codices C and E omit both Amphis' name and the play's title (cf. Arnott 2000 and Intro. 3 "Tradition & Reception"). In l. 2 Athenaeus' manuscript tradition unanimously preserves the reading θάνατος δ' ὁ θάνατός ἐστιν, which makes no sense (the death is death) – in addition to scanning incorrectly. The reading ἀθάνατος ὁ θάνατός ἐστιν is Elmsley's suggestion (1809: comm. on Ar. Ach. 49), which provides both a meaningful and a metrically correct line.

Interpretation Both the speaker and the addressee are of unspecified sex. The speaker sounds much like a guru and rather arrestingly instructs his/her collocutor to indulge in all kinds of pleasure and enjoy life to the full, keeping in mind the inescapable mortality. The asyndetic syntax of the first line and the arresting double imperative πῖνε, παῖζε generate an authoritative air and a transfixing effect.

This is an intriguing distich. To begin with, line 1 champions hedonism and echoes what was believed to have been Ashurbanipal's key precept: ἔσθιε, πῖνε, παῖζε (eat, drink, have fun [or be amorous]) or πῖνε, παῖζε, ὄχευε (drink, have fun, have sex). Ashurbanipal's axiom is preserved in various sources with minor modifications: Str. 14.5.9, Ath. 12.530b-c, Arr. An. 2.5.4, Aristobulus FGrH 139 F 9, Apollodorus FGrH 244 F 303.

This call for a pleasure-pursuing modus vivendi archetypically features in Worse-Argument's speech in Aristophanes' Clouds, cf. esp. the asyndetic line 1078: χρῶ τῇ φύσει, σκίρτα, γέλα, νόμιζε μηδὲν αἰσχρόν (indulge your nature, romp, laugh, think nothing shameful). In Middle (and also New) Comedy it is concretely identified as ἡδέως ζῆν and is accumulatively found in Philetaerus (PCG 7,322), e. g. frr. 6, 7, 13, and elsewhere: e. g. Amphis fr. 21, Theophil. fr. 12, [Alex.] fr. 25, Philippid. fr. 6, Apollod.Car. vel Gel. fr. 16. In all these passages there is a constant call for a luxurious and materialistic life, a call to enjoy all sorts of pleasure during lifetime, since life is short. The basic triad of sought-after pleasures is food, wine, and sex, just like Ashurbanipal's instruction: ἔσθιε, πῖνε, παῖζε. See further Ameling 1985.

The call to seize the pleasures of the moment without concern for the future has subsequently been crystallised and turned into a well-known cliché by Horace, i. e. the carpe diem admonition (Od. 1.11.6–8): "sapias, vina liques et spatio brevi / spem longam reseces. Dum loquimur, fugerit invida / aetas: carpe diem, quam minimum credula postero" (be wise, mix the wine, and limit that far-reaching hope, since time is short. As we speak, the envious moment is flying away: seize the day, and credit the time ahead with as little faith as you can).

Of course, the ideal of hedonism can be traced back to archaic lyric poetry. Alcaeus already encourages his fellows (fr. 346 LP): πώνωμεν (let us drink!) since δάκτυλος ἀμέρα (the day is only as long as a finger's breadth). Likewise, Archilochus presents himself enjoying wine (frr. 2 and 4) and delivers his best performance when his mind has been lightning-blasted with wine (οἴνῳ συγκεραυνωθεὶς φρένας; fr. 120); and Mimnermus (fr. 1) believes life is meaningless without the pleasures of eros: τίς δὲ βίος, τί δὲ τερπνὸν ἄτερ χρυσῆς Ἀφροδίτης; (what is life, what can be pleasant without golden Aphrodite?).

Aside from promoting the carpe diem admonition, Amphis' distich is additionally interesting for arguing a captivating paradox: life is associated with mortality (θνητὸς ὁ βίος), whereas death is considered immortal (ἀθάνατος ὁ θάνατος). See further s. v. ἀθάνατος.

Metre The trochaic tetrameter catalectic is only used twice by Amphis; in the present fragment and in fr. 7 (ubi vide for further discussion). Just as in fr. 7, the speaker's excitement and emotional agitation can reasonably explain Amphis' alternative metrical choice. What is additionally noteworthy here is that both lines feature a high rate of resolution with an unusual run of seven short syllables, which favours and intensifies the effect of the asyndeton in l. 1.

1 παῖζε The verb παίζω has various meanings, most of which make perfect sense within a symposion context: it can mean to play (an instrument or a game), to dance, to jest (cf. LSJ[9] s. v.). But it can also be used euphemistically to describe the acts of flirting and sexual intercourse (LSJ[9] s. v. I.5), e. g. Ar. Pl. 1055, X. Smp. 9.2; cf. Henderson ([2]1991) 157. Here it would be unwise to comprehend παίζω as referring exclusively to sex. As the opposite of σπουδάζω (be serious or earnest; e. g. X. Mem. 4.1.1, cf. LSJ[9] s. v.), παίζω should rather be understood as a general advice to enjoy all aspects of life and to indulge in all kinds of pleasure; of course, part of this enjoyment is sex, but there are also other delights, e. g. revelling, playfully indulging in food and wine, and being light-hearted. Such a flirtatious and frolicsome atmosphere is described at length in Mnesimachus fr. 4, and especially in lines 52–55 where the verb παίζω occurs too (within a lengthy asyndeton), again with a similar meaning of living it up in a symposion context: πᾶς δὲ κατ' οἴκους μάττει, πέττει, / τίλλει, κόπτει, τέμνει, δεύει, / χαίρει, παίζει, πηδᾷ, δειπνεῖ, / πίνει, σκιρτᾷ, λορδοῖ, κεντεῖ (everyone in the house is kneading, cooking, plucking, chopping, cutting up, drenching, rejoicing, playing, leaping, dining, drinking, frisking, bending backwards, pricking).

2 ἀθάνατος Line 2 features a conspicuous case of notional subtlety. The present meaning of the term ἀθάνατος is everlasting, perpetual, eternal; cf. Philem. fr. 165 ἀθάνατόν ἐστι κακὸν ἀναγκαῖον γυνή (women are an everlasting evil, albeit a necessary one); cf. LSJ[9] s. v. II. The speaker in Amphis' present fragment describes death as unending and permanent, but in so doing he engages in a twofold word pun: (i) ἀθάνατος as unending is used to describe θάνατος, a noun deriving from the same stem -θαν-, which signifies however the exact opposite: the ultimate end; (ii) most frequently ἀθάνατος means immortal and, as such, is the exact opposite of θνητός, a term that the speaker employs in the first line to describe life. The phonemic resemblance (ἀθάνατος ≈ θάνατος) is subtly merged with the semantic antithesis (ἀθάνατος ≠ θνητός), and the result is a fascinating paradox: life is matched with mortality (θνητὸς ὁ βίος) and death with immortality (ἀθάνατος ὁ θάνατος). This conceptual paradox is emphasised even more through the verbal echo ἀθάνατος – θάνατος, and the parechesis of the letters π and θ. The conceptual antitheses, the verbal echoes, as well as the reversal of normal perspectives are all major features of the sophistic artillery; cf. e. g. Gorgias' speeches that abound in language twists and plays (e. g. Hel. 7, 20, 21; Pal. 3, 5, 22). Amphis impeccably masters these sophistic techniques; in fact, this is the second time that he makes use of them; cf. the paradox argued in fr. 1 and Intro. 6 ("Language"). The riddling language of the second line is reminiscent of Heraclitus as well; e. g. fr. 50 DK γενητὸν ἀγένητον, θνητὸν ἀθάνατον (originable unoriginable, mortal immortal); fr. 62 DK ἀθάνατοι θνητοί, θνητοὶ ἀθάνατοι, ζῶντες τὸν ἐκείνων θάνατον, τὸν δὲ ἐκείνων βίον τεθνεῶτες (immortal mortals, mortal immortals, one living the others' death and dying the others' life). The paradoxical imagery of death as immortal and/or unending is picked up later by Latin poets, e. g. Lucretius 3.869: "mortalem vitam mors cum inmortalis ademit" (because the immortal death takes away the mortal life), Catullus 5.5–6: "nobis cum semel occidit brevis lux / nox est perpetua una dormienda" (when that brief light has fallen for us, we must sleep a never ending night).

Γυναικομανία (Gynaikomania)
("Madness for or of women")

Discussion Meineke 1,405; Papachrysostomou 44–50

Title This is the only known play with this title. But although unparalleled, the title is reminiscent (i) of the two Γυναικοκρατία-plays, one by Amphis (ubi vide) and one by Alexis (cf. Arnott 1996: 151–153); and (ii) of Anaxandrides' Γεροντομανία (cf. Millis 2001: 45–57). The term γυναικομανία grammatically allows for two possible interpretations: either madness / lust for women (objective genitive) or madness / craziness of women (subjective genitive). Everywhere else the terms γυναικομανία, γυναικομανέω and γυναικομανής unanimously reveal madness for women; e. g. Hom. Il. 3.39, Ar. Th. 576, Chrysipp.Stoic. fr. 667, Plu. 769b. Besides, other cases of compound terms where the verb μαίνομαι features as the second component, the term typically reveals a madness / a zealous enthusiasm for the notion revealed by the first component; e. g. λακωνομανῶ (be mad about Spartan ways; Ar. Av. 1281), ὀρνιθομανῶ (be mad about birds; Ar. Av. 1284). Similarly, in Amphis' present case, if we adopt the meaning be mad for / about women, a number of plot-possibilities present themselves: (a) a man may have a passion for a particular woman; (b) a man may be in pursuit of women in general; (c) several men may be after one or more women. In all three cases the women in question could be either free-born or hetairai.

Nevertheless, the sense "madness of women" cannot be ruled out entirely. Apart from the parallel case of the Γυναικοκρατία play-title, which translates as subjective genitive ("control / regime of women"), it is also significant that in Anaxandrides' Γεροντομανία the notion of craziness, rather than that of lust, seems more plausible. For it is hard to imagine how old men can be sexually attractive. Millis also understands the title as "madness or infatuation of old men rather than a lust for old men" (2001: 45). But this is comedy and we cannot rule out the idea that someone had a passion for old men; it is, however, less likely especially since senility was a phenomenon as familiar to the ancient Greeks as to us. Mutatis mutandis, if γυναικομανία denotes indeed madness of women, such madness can be understood in more than one ways. Given the existence of both Ecclesiazusae and the two Γυναικοκρατία-plays (by Amphis and Alexis), one is allowed to discern in Γυναικομανία a roughly parallel pattern, i. e. some kind of female domination; women going awry and misbehaving, in total disaccord with the socio-political status traditionally assigned to them. An altogether different approach would be to identify this as a largely mythical play (cf. Amphis' propensity for mythical plots; Intro. 4 "Themes & Motifs"), and accordingly explain this madness as a divinely inspired one, i. e. a ritual madness, possibly bacchic, parallel to the one described in Euripides' Bacchae.[6] This hypothesis gains some support, if we interpret the Eurybatus mentioned in fr. 10 as the mythical character (see comm. ad loc.). However, it is difficult to imagine the kind of mythical plot that could accommodate both frenzied women (or frenzied suitors of women) and Eurybatus as one of the Cercopes, and it would be a mere conjecture to try to reconstruct any further details. Whatever the myth elements, if any, they must have been given a comic twist, allowing again for a mixture of myth with contemporary, fourth century life.

On balance, I am inclined to interpret the present play-title as Madness of / about women. But, apart from comprehending the title, what should not be overlooked is the conspicuous thematic convergence of all three surviving fragments: they all relate to some sort of indulgence, which pertains to a sympotic context either explicitly or implicitly: fr. 9 explicitly records the major sympotic pleasures; fr. 10 refers to excessive food consumption, probably within a sympotic context again; and fr. 11 refers to gambling (which may or may not necessitate a symposion). Hence, it is highly probable that the play featured a symposion, which would constitute a mostly apposite background for lustful pursuit of women (hetairai). On Aristophanic symposia see Pütz (2007) 1–120.

fr. 9 (9 K.)

ἤδη ποτ' ἤκουσας βίον ἀληλεμένον; (B.) ναί. (A.) τοῦτ' ἐκεῖν' ἐστὶν σαφῶς· ἄμητες, οἶνος ἡδύς, ᾠά, σησαμαῖ, μύρον, στέφανος, αὐλητρίς. (B.) ὦ Διοσκόρω,
5 ὀνόματα τῶν δώδεκα θεῶν διελήλυθας

2 αἰ A: om. CE: :: ναί. :: Dobree Adv. II 348

(A.) Have you ever heard of a refined life? (B.) Yes. (A.) This is certainly it:
milk cakes, sweet wine, eggs, sesame sweets, perfume, a wreath, a pipe-girl. (B.) Dioscuri, 5 you've listed the names of the twelve gods!

[6] On maenadism see Bremmer 1984; Henrichs 1978, 1984, 1994; Ubbels 2008. In general, Greek (male) mentality conceived women as particularly prone to becoming possessed by demonic passion; cf. Padel ([2]1993) 3–19.

Ath. 14.642a-b
Ἄμφις δὲ ἐν Γυναικομανίᾳ (δὲ ἐν Γυν. om. CE)· ἤδη — διελήλυθας Amphis in "Madness for or of women": "(A.) Have — gods"

Metre Iambic trimeter

1.	— — ⏑ — — — ⏑ —
2.	⏑ — ⏑ ⏑ — —	— ⏑ — — — ⏑ —	(penthemimeral caesura)
3.	⏑ — ⏑ — ⏑ — ⏑	— ⏑ — ⏑ —	(hephthemimeral caesura)
4.	⏑ — ⏑ ⏑ ⏑ — — ⏑	— ⏑ — ⏑ —	(hephthemimeral caesura)
5.	⏑ ⏑ ⏑ ⏑	— ⏑ ⏑ ⏑ — ⏑ ⏑ — ⏑ —	(triemimeral caesura)

Discussion Meineke 3,303f.; Bothe 481; Kock 2,238; Edmonds 2,316f.; PCG 2,217; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 295f.; Papachrysostomou 46–48

Citation Context The serving of desserts among the banqueters (Ath. 14.639b) naturally triggers the quotation of a lengthy series of fragments that aim to provide evidence about the nature and the content of the relevant terms τραγήματα / τρωγάλια (sweetmeats, nibbles), ἐπιδορπίσματα / ἐπιφορήματα (after-dinner snacks) and δεύτεραι τράπεζαι (second tables, where all the above kinds of desserts were served). At 14.641e the discussion particularly focuses on bringing out the difference between τράγημα/τρωγάλιον and βρῶμα/ ἔδεσμα (ordinary/ proper food); to this end, Athenaeus cites two fragments of Antiphanes (frr. 138 and 172.5–6) followed by Amphis' present fragment, as evidence for the items traditionally served after the dinner proper.

Constitution of Text The Epitome codices C and E omit the play's title (cf. Arnott 2000 and Intro. 3 "Tradition & Reception"). In l. 2 both the reading ναί and the division of speakers are Dobree's conjectures (Adv. II 348; following Schweighaeuser Animadv. ad loc.). Instead, codex A preserves the meaningless reading αἱ, while C and E skip this point altogether, without preserving anything.

Interpretation Speaker A (of unidentified sex) describes to speaker B (of either the same or the opposite sex) a heavenly situation that recalls a symposion context and encompasses all three major pleasures: food (ἄμητες, etc.), wine (οἶνος), and entertainment / sex (αὐλητρίς). The fact that speaker A employs two consecutive colloquialisms (βίον ἀληλεμένον and τοῦτ' ἐκεῖν'; see s. vv.) either reveals his / her enthusiasm (which naturally prompts people to express themselves spontaneously and unpretentiously, using everyday language) or is symptomatic of his / her status; i. e. this may be a simple, unlearned person, perhaps a slave (of either sex) or a woman.

This fragment is conspicuously paralleled by the programmatic statements of Praxagora in Ar. Ec. 605–606 and 689–710; with women being in charge of the public affairs, men are left with nothing but a life consisting of merely eating, drinking, and having sex. Although ultimately unprovable, it is still not inconceivable that Amphis' fragment fitted into a parallel context. It may be important that the term βίος is present (l. 1); i. e. what we are presented with here is not to be perceived as an isolated occasion (e. g. a usual symposion), but rather as a description of a permanent situation that is an entrancing and a preposterous modus vivendi. In such a case, speaker A may actually be a woman instructing and introducing an ignorant male into the "rules" of this new way of life.

Alternatively, since the term βίος is actually part of the colloquial expression βίος ἀληλεμένος, this may simply be a description / visualisation of or an invitation to a single, bountiful symposion. Comedy abounds in scenes that relate to an off-stage feast, whether it is a preparation for or an account of one (though see Webster [2]1960: 112, who argues – rather unconvincingly – about feasts taking place on stage); e. g. Ar. Pax 922–1126 (cf. Dohm 1964: 37–55), V. 1299ff., Ec. 834–852; Anaxandr. fr. 42; Men. Dysc. 943ff.; etc. The same pattern occurs even in tragedy; e. g. E. Alc. 747–802.

Arguably, the heavenly situation described in this fragment is reminiscent of the so-called comic utopias, which are defined by profusion of goods and are set in the distant past. For further analysis of this comic tradition and a more representative example see Amphis' Uranus ("Interpretation" of fr. 28).

1 ἤδη ποτ' ἤκουσας This forceful way of introducing a question is one of many possible variations of a standard pattern that aims to draw on the collocutor's experience. A verb meaning hear, listen, see, perceive, and the like is combined with ἤδη, sometimes followed by another adverb of time (if so, then preferably by either ποτέ or πώποτε), to form a forceful question; e. g. Amphis fr. 27.4, Ar. Nu. 346, Hermipp. fr. 37, Magnes fr. 2, Pl. R. 493d.

2 ἀληλεμένον Passive perfect participle of the verb ἀλέω, which means to grind, bruise (LSJ[9] s. v.). The passive perfect tense of ἀλέω is most frequently ἀλήλεσμαι; e. g. Hdt. 7.23, D.S. 3.14.1, etc. (totalling 158 instances in TLG's full corpus). But the participle ἀληλεμένον derives from the much rarer perfect ἀλήλεμαι; e. g. Th. 4.26.5 (totalling only 8 instances in TLG's corpus). Amphis' choice of the unusual type ἀληλεμένον was dictated by metrical reasons; i. e. a brevis element is required at the third position of the iambic metre (where the poet additionally practises resolution; see the metrical analysis above).

For the Attic reduplication in the formation of the perfect tense of ἀλέω see Lautensach (1899) 113–114.

1–2 βίον ἀληλεμένον A colloquialism. The phrase βίος ἀληλεσμένος (equivalent to ἀληλεμένος; cf. previous note) is registered as a proverbial expression in a number of lexicographic and paroemiographic sources; e. g. Sud. α 1183, Plu. CPG i,1.8, Zen. CPG i,1.21, Diogenian. i,1.17, Paus.Gr. α 65, etc. Its meaning is metaphorical and derives from the verb ἀλέω, to grind; a life (βίος) that is ground (ἀληλεσμένος), as in polished, smoothed, and refined, is an easy and effortless life, where a person finds everything ready and prepared and needs do nothing: ἐπὶ τῶν ἐν ἀφθονίᾳ τῶν ἐπιτηδείων ὄντων (Sud. l. c.); ἐπὶ τοῦ ἑτοίμου καὶ προχείρου καὶ ἀκόπου (Zen. l. c.); οἱ δὲ ἐπὶ τῶν ἀταλαιπώρως βιούντων· οἷον κατειργασμένον, πρὸς τροφὴν ἕτοιμον (Paus. Gr. l. c.). This usage of the expression is mostly apposite, for what follows is indeed an abundance of requisite provisions (ἀφθονία τῶν ἐπιτηδείων) for a complete banquet.

Nonetheless, strangely enough, though repeatedly recorded in lexica and proverb anthologies, this expression does not occur in any other kind of text apart from the present fragment and Thphr. Piet. fr. 2.31 (cf. Bernays 1866: 53–54). Hence, one can easily identify this as a colloquial phrase that designedly infiltrated Amphis' text to maximise – and thus communicate better to the audience – the speaker's excitement (cf. "Interpretation" above).

2 τοῦτ' ἐκεῖν' A colloquialism, the second one employed in a row by speaker A (see previous note). Its role is to add emphasis and draw the attention of speaker B to what follows. This colloquial expression occurs frequently in Aristophanes (e. g. Ar. Av. 355, Ra. 1342; cf. López Eire 1996: 113–114), Euripides (e. g. Ion 554, Or. 804; cf. Stevens 1976: 31–32), and also elsewhere; e. g. S. El. 1115, Pl. Phdr. 241d, D. 21.215.

3–4 ἄμητες … αὐλητρίς Here we have – albeit on a small scale – a stereotypical stylistic feature of Comedy: the list. The examples are abundant: Ar. Ach. 1089–1093, V. 676–677, Ec. 838–852; Alex. fr. 132; Anaxandr. fr. 42; Antiph. fr. 223; Ephipp. fr. 12; Eub. fr. 63; Mnesim. fr. 4 (cf. Papachrysostomou 2008: 186–210); etc. Such lists normally consist of foodstuffs (cf. Amphis fr. 16 "Interpretation"); but, as well as cataloguing other things (e. g. hetairai in Timocl. fr. 27), they may also be of an entirely heterogeneous content, as in Hermipp. fr. 63 (cf. Gilula 2000). Likewise, in the present fragment, food and wine are asyndetically combined with perfume, wreaths, and pipe-girls. See Dohm (1964) 59–61.

This is a pre-comic motif, examples of which can be found in iambos (e. g. Hippon. fr. 26a), as well as in elegy (e. g. Solon frr. 38–40); see West (1974) 31–32, Noussia (2001) 353–359.

3a ἄμητες The ἄμης was a type of milky cake: εἶδος πλακοῦντος γαλακτώδους (sch. on Ar. Pl. 999 = Sud. α 1581), which was regularly classified among τραγήματα (sweetmeats, desserts). The τραγήματα included a wide variety of foodstuffs (various types of cakes, πλακοῦντες, either savoury or sweet, figs (dried and fresh alike) and other dried fruits and nuts, chickpeas, various kinds of beans, etc.), which were supposed to soak up alcohol and stimulate thirst; hence, their consumption was typically accompanied by wine-drinking (the immediately following reference to οἶνος ἡδύς is most apposite). References to τραγήματα abound throughout Greek Comedy; e. g. Ar. Ra. 510, Ec. 844; Ephipp. fr. 8; Eub. fr. 44; Alex. frr. 168.2 (cf. Arnott 1996: 494), 190; Philem. fr. 158; Men. frr. 194, 409; etc. Cf. also Pl. R. 372c, Clearch. fr. 87 (ap. Ath. 14.648f-649a).

3b οἶνος ἡδύς Sweet wine; wine that is pleasant to the taste. By attributing to wine the quality of sweetness, Amphis lands in the middle of and continues a long-running literary tradition; for the term ἡδύς is one of the standard adjectives stereotypically used to characterise wine already in Homer (e. g. Od. 2.349–350, 3.51, 9.196–197, 10.519, 20.69 etc.), and also beyond, throughout Greek literature; e. g. B. fr. 11.5, Ar. Ach. 75, Eub. fr. 136, X. An. 1.9.25, Hp. Nat. Puer. 34.25, etc.

Ancient Greek diet was typically considered as tripartite, its three quintessential constituents being bread, opson (cf. comm. on Amphis fr. 26 s. v. ὄψον), and wine (cf. Garnsey 1999: 12–21). First and foremost, wine was a sine qua non item of the symposion, and also part and parcel of comic discourse – and expectedly so, given its association with Dionysus, the god of drama and especially comic drama. Aristophanes calls wine the milk of Aphrodite (Ἀφροδίτης γάλα; fr. 613), thus emphasizing the multi-layered pleasure induced by its consumption. Yet, the effects of wine consumption could range from poetic inspiration (cf. Cratinus' Πυτίνη: The Wine-flask, esp. fr. 203; cf. Bakola 2010: 59–63) and emotional group bonding (extending to socialisation, military experience, and political alliance), to incest (Antiph. fr. 19) and abusive παροινία (drunken and violent behaviour; cf. Men. Epit. 472, and comm. on Amphis fr. 29). The discussion of both the positive effects of wine and the negative consequences of its excessive consumption constitutes a recurring topos in Comedy and elsewhere. A most favourable picture of wine's benefits is drawn in Ar. Eq. 85–96; in addition, Amphis fr. 33 features a conspicuous eulogy of drink-lovers (φιλοπόται; cf. with comm. ad loc.); see also comm. on Amphis fr. 41 (s. v. ὕδωρ πίνοντες). On the other hand, the archetypically cunning use of wine is attributed to Apollo, who is believed to have used wine as a means of seduction, in order to placate, soothe, and persuade the Moirai to change their minds regarding Admetus' fate (A. Eum. 728): οἴνῳ παρηπάτησας (codd.; or παρηπάφησας Davies) ἀρχαίας θεάς (you beguiled the ancient goddesses with wine); cf. Aristotle's remark (Pr. 3.873ᵃ22–23): ὁ οἶνος καὶ τετυφωμένους ποιεῖ καὶ μανικούς (wine makes people both stupefied and frenzied). For an in-depth analysis of wine's multifaceted role in the socio–political and the military sphere see Osborne 2014 and Murray 1991. See also Tolles (1943) 77–90, Murray 1994a, Bowie 1995, Rösler 1995, Wilkins (2000) 202–256, Wilkins & Shaun (2006) 166–186, Pütz (^{2}2007) 156–174. For the price of wine in fourth century Athens see Arnott (1996) 97. For an interesting and all-inclusive survey of wine's origins see McGovern (2007) passim (esp. 239–278).

The themes of wine and wine-drinking recur frequently in Amphis' corpus; see frr. 29, 33, 36, 37, 40, 41 (with comm. ad loc.).

3c σησαμαῖ σησαμαῖ (sg. σησαμῆ) and σησαμίδες (sg. σησαμίς) were synonymous terms (Sud. σ 341 ≈ sch. on Ar. Ach. 1092a) that denoted the same delicacy: round sweets that were moulded together out of roasted sesame seeds, honey, and olive oil (Ath. 14.646f); they regularly followed the main courses as a dessert (τράγημα; see comm. on l. 3a above); cf. Ephipp. fr. 13 (μετὰ δεῖπνον). These sesame rolls were especially (though not exclusively) served at weddings, for sesame seeds were regarded as a symbol of fertility; cf. Ar. Pax 869 with sch. ad loc. (διὰ τὸ πολύγονον), Men. Sam. 74–75, 125. See Oakley & Sinos (1993) 11–37.

The term σησαμίδες features in Eup. fr. 176, Antiph. fr. 79, and Ephipp. fr. 13, whereas σησαμῆ is used by Aristophanes and Menander ll. c. The plural σησαμαῖ is solely used here by Amphis. Apparently, there is no particular significance attached to this interchangeability of terms.

4a μύρον, στέφανος Perfume / scented oil and wreaths (made of ivy and/or other flowers) were two indispensable items of symposia and stereotypically featured in such contexts; e. g. Ar. Ach. 1085–1093, Ec. 834–852; Macho fr. 16.262–268; Archestr. fr. 60 (cf. Olson & Sens 2000: 224–238). The anointing of the banqueters with perfume along with their garlanding with wreaths normally followed the main meal and preceded the wine-drinking session (accompanied by the second tables containing the after-dinner snacks: τραγήματα); cf. Pl.Com. fr. 71, Nicostr.Com. fr. 27, Alex. fr. 252, Matro fr. 1.104–122 (cf. Olson & Sens 1999: 134–144). For the multiple varieties of perfume and the various sorts of flowers that were used in wreaths see Poll. 6.104–107.

The custom of anointing one's head with perfume is given a practical explanation by Philonides the physician. In his now lost treatise On Perfumes and Garlands (Περὶ Μύρων καὶ Στεφάνων; apud Ath. 15.692a-b), Philonides argued that this ritual originated from the desire to reduce the strength of wine and prevent it from being drawn upwards to the head, since it was believed that a dry head attracted anything that was taken into the stomach; cf. Posidonius FGrH 87 F 72 (apud Ath. 2.45f-2.46a). See Pütz (^{2}2007) 212–224.

4b αὐλητρίς Pipe-girls were commonly present at symposia. Comedy abounds in references to pipe-girls and similar female artists (e. g. κιθαρίστριαι: cithara-players, ψάλτριαι: harpers, ὀρχηστρίδες: dancers), all of whom frequently doubled as hetairai and entertained the guests with their music and / or dance as well as with their sexual services; e. g. Ar. Ach. 1091–1093, V. 1216–1222, Ra. 513–516; Pl.Com. fr. 71; Metag. fr. 4 (cf. Orth 2014: 400–406); Antiph. fr. 233; Matro fr. 1.121–122 (cf. Olson & Sens 1999: 142–143); Pl. R. 373a, Smp. 176e; X. Smp. 2.1–2. For a thorough discussion of the role of αὐλός (pipe) at the symposion see Wilson (1999) 82–85.

4c ὦ Διοσκόρω The Dioscuri, Castor and Pollux, were Sparta's patron deities. Invocations to them are conspicuously rare in Comedy. In fact, there are only three other such instances: Ar. Pax 285, Ec. 1069, and Men. Dysc. 192. The reason why speaker B calls upon the divine and makes this apostrophe is his/her immense excitement at the prospect of the heavenly situation described to him/her. Likewise, a similar exuberance triggered by envisaging a feast prompts the speaker in Alex. fr. 168 to invoke the gods; yet, in this fragment by Alexis the apostrophe is a generalised one that addresses all gods (ὦ θεοί). Instead, in Amphis' current fragment it is possible that there is some particular significance attached to this invocation to Dioscuri, given the extreme rarity of such cases.

A brief look at the three such cases mentioned above proves fairly enlightening. Unlike Men. Dysc. 192, where no Spartan association can be established, the invocation at Ar. Pax 285 is explained by the ancient scholia ad loc. on account of Dioscuri's Spartan affinities (διὸ νῦν αὐτῶν μέμνηται, ὅτι Βρασίδου τοῦ Λακεδαιμονίου ἐμνήσθη: this is why he brings them up, because he mentioned the Spartan Brasidas). Although the invocation at Ec. 1069 may simply originate from Dioscuri's role as protectors of travellers (Ussher 1973: 222–223), it is still not inconceivable that the Dioscuri, as overt Spartan protectors, may have seemed to be the most appropriate deities to be invoked within Ecclesiazusae, a play with a particularly Spartan tone.[7] A possible resemblance of Amphis' present play to Ecclesiazusae (cf. "Interpretation") would accordingly render this invocation to the Dioscuri relevant to the play's context.

5 δώδεκα θεῶν The exclamation, combined with the apostrophe to the Dioscuri (cf. previous note), reveals heightened emotion and enthusiasm. With comic exaggeration the speaker equates the various symposion-related items with the Olympian gods. In addition, what he brands as the "twelve gods", are actually not twelve but seven symposion essentials. So the joke is double; the twelve gods are substituted with seven items of pleasure. The euphoria of the speaker is overwhelming.

---

[7] Praxagora champions the establishment of a communal society, where private property would be abolished (590–594); and the women generally assume unprecedented – for the Athenian society – liberties and rights. For parallels within the Spartan regime see Arist. Pol. 1269^{b}31–34, X. Lac. 1.3–4, 11.1, Plu. Lyc. 10. See also Willetts (1959) 501.

The mentions of the "twelve gods" in Comedy can be either simple references (as in this fragment) or invocations. But they are not particularly frequent; the only ones are: Ar. Av. 95, Aristopho fr. 11.2 (references); Ar. Eq. 235, Men. Kol. 127, Sam. 306, adesp. com. fr. 1013 (invocations). See Lehrs ([2]1875) 245–248.

An altar dedicated to the twelve gods existed in the Athenian agora from the second half of the sixth century BC (Th. 6.54.6–7). For a thorough discussion see Crosby 1949.

fr. 10 (10 K.)

Εὐρύβατε κνισολοιχέ, <–> οὐκ ἔσθ' ὅπως οὐκ ὀλβιογάστωρ εἶ σύ

1 <μὰ Δί'> Meineke: <χαῖρ'> Idem Anal. p. 169: <νῦν> Kock

You, fat-licker Eurybatus, there's no way you are not a belly-god!

Ath. 9.386e–f (inde Eust. ad Il. 1.633.8–9) τοῦ μὲν ὀλβιογάστορος Ἄμφις μέμνηται ἐν Γυναικομανίᾳ (fab. nom. om. CE, poet. et fab. Eust.) οὑτωσὶ λέγων· Εὐρύβατε — σύ it is Amphis who mentions the term "olbiogastōr" in "Madness for or of women" putting it in this way: "You — belly-god!"

Metre Iambic trimeter
1. –⏑⏑⏑– ⏑–⏑|<–> ––⏑– (hephthemimeral caesura)
2. ––⏑⏑– – –⏑

Discussion Meineke 3,304f.; Bothe 481f.; Kock 2,238f.; Edmonds 2,316f.; PCG 2,218; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 296; Papachrysostomou 48–50

Citation Context The quotation of this fragment is a result of a showy antagonism and exchange of pedantic knowledge between the two grammarians Myrtilus and Ulpian in Book 9 of Athenaeus' Deipnosophistae. Myrtilus calls Ulpian ὀλβιογάστωρ (9.386c) ironically, for being an archetypical pedant rather than a belly-god (cf. 9.385a-c). This impels Ulpian to challenge Myrtilus to come up with the reference for this – apparently rare – term (ὁ ὀλβιογάστωρ σοι πόθεν – (tell me) where you got the term olbiogastōr from; 9.386e). The erudite Myrtilus then quotes Amphis' fragment as the origin of this bizarre noun. Eustathius (ad Il. 1.633.8–9), drawing on Athenaeus, also preserves Amphis' fragment.

Constitution of Text The Epitome codices C and E leave out the play's title (cf. Arnott 2000 and Intro. 3 "Tradition & Reception"), while Eustathius leaves out both Amphis' name and the play's title. In l. 1 the second longum of the second metre is missing; all three suggestions (μὰ Δί' / χαῖρ' / νῦν) could satisfactorily fill the lacuna, although there is no parallel case for any of them.

Interpretation The speaker (of unidentifiable sex) addresses someone else, possibly male since he is called Eurybatus (though this is not absolute). The addressee is probably present on stage; otherwise, if the speaker soliloquises addressing an absent character, then the latter must be someone that the audience has previously seen, even briefly, on stage. Adopting an emphatically derisive tone (cf. the expression οὐκ ἔσθ' ὅπως), the speaker delivers a playful invective against the addressee and twice (κνισολοιχός, ὀλβιογάστωρ) credits him with immense gluttony. He/she could be additionally accusing him of cunningness (perhaps in relation to dinner tactics), if the name Eurybatus was presently meant as a synonym for guilefulness, after the historic traitor Eurybatus (see s. v.). Alternatively, Eurybatus could refer to the homonymous mythical figure (cf. the hypothesis presented above about this being an essentially mythical play).

The words κνισολοιχός and ὀλβιογάστωρ imply a gastronomic context, parallel to that of fr. 9. Though unprovable, it is conceivable that the addressee is the ebullient speaker B of fr. 9 (see s. v. δώδεκα θεῶν), that he is in fact a parasite, and that this distich is spoken during a symposion (perhaps the one visualised in fr. 9), where the addressee proves an archetypical glutton, thus triggering the mockery of one of his fellow banqueters.

The parasite figure (in various guises) has a long pedigree in Greek literature. The first free-loaders we meet are Penelope's suitors in Homer (e. g. Od. 1.91–92, 2.50–59), whereas (from a different point of view) Odysseus – disguised as an ugly old beggar – is the first uninvited guest to dinner (ἄκλητος), asking the suitors for food and drink in Hom. Od. 17.360ff.; cf. esp. ll. 386–387: οὗτοι γὰρ κλητοί γε βροτῶν ἐπ' ἀπείρονα γαῖαν· / πτωχὸν δ' οὐκ ἄν τις καλέοι τρύξοντα ἓ αὐτόν (these men (i. e. entertainers, seers, etc.) are invited all over the boundless earth; yet a beggar would no man invite to be a burden to himself);

see further Fehr 1994. Regarding Comedy, the parasite figure appears already in Epicharmus (frr. 31, 32, 33), and his presence permeates ever since the comic genre, both Greek and Roman. The term that was initially used for parasite was not παράσιτος, but κόλαξ (cf. Ath. 6.236e, Polemon fr. 78 Preller); yet, it appears that Epicharmus had already used the term παράσιτος (fr. 33). The addressee in Amphis' present fragment is accused of an insatiable appetite, which – in theory – could apply to any comic character; but it would be especially befitting to a comic portrayal of a parasite. The parasite figure has a ubiquitous presence in all comic eras experiencing its heyday during the fourth century BC (and beyond); see Nesselrath (1985) 15–70, 93–96, 102–111; Nesselrath (1990) 309–317; Arnott (1996) 542–545; Damon (1997) 23–26; Fisher (2000) 371–378. Throughout Comedy parasites are depicted as determinate dinner-goers who arrive early and are prepared to accept all challenges, in order to secure a free meal; cf. Eup. fr. 175 (from his play Kolakes): οὐ πῦρ οὐδὲ σίδηρος / οὐδὲ χαλκὸς ἀπείργει / μὴ φοιτᾶν ἐπὶ δεῖπνον: nor fire nor iron nor bronze can stop us from going to dinner), Cratin. fr. 46, Aristopho fr. 5.2 (ἂν τις ἑστιᾷ, πάρειμι πρῶτος: if anyone gives a feast, I am the first to arrive), Antiph. frr. 193 and 80, Timocl. fr. 8, Diph. fr. 61. Furthermore, Eupolis in his Kolakes coins two adjectives that are synonymous to ὀλβιογάστωρ: κοιλιοδαίμων (belly-god; fr. 187) and ταγηνοκνισοθήρας (frying-pan-sniffer; fr. 190), with reference to the ravenous title-figures. Interestingly, Asius' κνισοκόλαξ (greasy parasite; fr. 14.2) also refers to a parasite.

In Old Comedy (and also in satyr play) such a great appetite was a trade mark of Heracles, e. g. Ar. Pax 741, Av. 1583–1590; Phryn.Com. fr. 24; Cratin. fr. 346; cf. Galinsky (1972) 81–100. Although the hungry Heracles dies out with Old Comedy, a caricature of Heracles would fit the present plot insofar as Eurybatus referred to the homonymous mythical character (cf. comm. s. v. Εὐρύβατε); however, this would mean that in the fragment Heracles is absurdly addressed by the name of his foe.

Overall, taking into consideration all available evidence (cf. comm. on individual lemmata below) and, most importantly, the vocabulary relating to parasites, we can – with enough certainty – identify the addressee of this fragment as a stereotypical fourth century BC parasite figure. The alternative possibility of Heracles posing as a hungry parasite within a largely mythical plot featuring the Cercopes – though cannot be entirely ruled out – is a remote and rather unilikely one.

Metre In l. 1 the second longum of the second metre is missing. The quotation of the fragment ends in a way that the last element of the second metre and the entire third metre of the second line are missing.

1a Εὐρύβατε There are at least two possible interpretations here. This can be either a nickname pointing to the addressee's slyness or an apostrophe to Eurybatus the mythical figure. An apostrophe to a contemporary character called Eurybatus is unlikely, since there are no Attic records of this name; cf. Kirchner PA 5959 (s. v. Εὐρύβοτος): "Εὐρύβατος … nomen ab Atticis alienum est".

The first interpretation originates from the anecdote about the notorious traitor Eurybatus of Ephesus, who betrayed Croesus to Cyrus. The Lydian king had entrusted Eurybatus with a huge amount of money and the mission to recruit Greek mercenaries; but Eurybatus defected to Cyrus and handed him the money instead; see Ephorus FGrH 70 F 58, D.S. 9.32, Sud. ε 3717. Hence, the name Εὐρύβατος became synonymous with πονηρία (knavery) and μοχθηρία (wickedness); cf. e. g. Aeschin. 3.137. It is in this sense that Aristophanes employs Εὐρύβατος as a nickname for Zeus (fr. 198 Εὐρύβατον Δία). Likewise, the speaker in Amphis' fragment may be accusing the addressee of cunningness.

The second interpretation makes Eurybatus one of the Cercopes, a pair of mythical tricksters, variously named as Eurybatus and Hōlus, Sillus and Trivalus, or Acmōn and Passalus. They were brothers, notorious for plundering, robbing, and killing travellers (though some sources describe them as a whole tribe of villains). They were eventually subdued by Heracles; cf. D.S. 4.31.7, Apollod. 2.6.3, Diotimus fr. 2. According to a different line of the tradition, Zeus transformed them into apes, as a punishment for their crimes; cf. Ovid Met. 14.88–100.

1b κνισολοιχέ The adjective κνισολοιχός is a coinage by either Amphis, Antiphanes or Sophilus, since its usage is limited to these three comic poets: κνισολοιχός occurs only here, in Antiph. fr. 64 and Sophil. fr. 8 (in addition, the noun κνισολοιχία occurs once: Sophil. fr. 6). The adjective κνισολοιχός derives from κνῖσα (steam and odour of fat) and λείχω (lick); hence, it metaphorically describes someone whose gluttony is so preposterous that he would lick and wipe clean the dishes not only from any leftovers but – if it was literally feasible – even from the food's very steam and odour, i. e. leaving nothing behind. Compounds with κνῖσα are common mocking characterisations; e. g. ταγηνοκνισοθήρας (frying-pan-sniffer; Eup. fr. 190), κνισοτηρητής (fat-hunter; adesp. com. fr. 622), κνισοκόλαξ (greasy parasite; Asius fr. 14.2), κνισοδιώκτης (fat-hunter; v.l. [Hom.] Batr. 232). See further analysis under the combined lemma κνισολοιχέ - ὀλβιογάστωρ.

1c οὐκ ἔσθ' ὅπως The phrase οὐκ ἔστιν ὅπως (οὐκ ἔσθ' ὅπως with elision) is a very common expression in both poetry and prose, intended to add extreme emphasis to a point and categorically rule out all alternative options; cf. e. g. A. Ag. 620, S. Ant. 329, E. Ph. 1670, Ar. Ach. 116, Pl. Smp. 223a, Isoc. 11.5, etc. In the cases where this phrase is followed by negation (as in Amphis' fragment), the resulting meaning is a strong and unrefutable cataphasis. Amazingly, this expression is used in Araros fr. 16 to qualify a person as a downright parasite: οὐκ ἔσθ' ὅπως οὐκ εἶ παράσιτος, φίλτατε (there's no way you are not a parasite, my dear friend), with the term παράσιτος being (notionally) equivalent to Amphis' ὀλβιογάστωρ. It is conceivable that Amphis' phraseology is a conscious and imaginative variation of his predecessor's literal formulation (cf. s. v. ὀλβιογάστωρ). Further examples (with negation following) include E. IT 684 κοὐκ ἔσθ' ὅπως οὐ χρὴ συνεκπνεῦσαί μέ σοι (and it is surely right for me to breathe my last with you), Ar. Eq. 238 οὐκ ἔσθ' ὅπως οὐ Χαλκιδέας ἀφίστατον (there is no doubt you are inciting the Chalcidians to revolt), Isoc. 5.123 οὐκ ἔσθ' ὅπως οὐ μᾶλλον τῶν ἄλλων εὐδοκιμήσεις (you cannot fail to surpass everyone else).

2 ὀλβιογάστωρ A hapax. This term is a coinage devised by Amphis. It occus only in this fragment and in Athenaeus' text immediately prior to this fragment's citation (9.386c, 386e), within an antagonistic framework between the banqueters (cf. "Citation Context"): the very fact that a pedantic challenge is set, in order to retrieve the ultimate source of this term, alongside with the precise phraseology employed (ὁ ὀλβιογάστωρ σοι πόθεν: (tell me) where you got the word olbiogastōr from; 9.386e) evince the singularity of the term's occurrence.

This unique epithet is a derisive term: combining the notions of ὄλβος / ὄλβιος (bliss / blessed) and γαστήρ (belly), the word ὀλβιογάστωρ is a comic formation that very graphically describes as glutton someone who finds happiness and bliss in his belly, i. e. in eating. The mocking sense of ὀλβιογάστωρ becomes even more palpable and intense, since it is modelled upon a series of adjectives which are also compound with ὄλβος, but which entail solemn and elevated notions instead; e. g. ὀλβιοδαίμων (of blessed lot: Hom. Il. 3.182), ὀλβιόδωρος (bestowing bliss: E. Hipp. 750), ὀλβιοεργός (making happy: AP 9.525.16), ὀλβιόμοιρος (of blessed lot: Orph. H. 26.6), etc. Another derisive term, similarly modelled upon these serious epithets, is ὀλβιότυφος (happy in his own conceit; Bion fr. 7).

1–2 κνισολοιχέ - ὀλβιογάστωρ (see also the individual lemmata above) The fact that ὀλβιογάστωρ is demonstrably a coinage by Amphis may imply that κνισολοιχός is probably a coinage by him as well (rather than by Antiphanes or Sophilus); i. e. the addressee's gluttony is so much beyond words that the astounded speaker literally needs new terms to describe it; hence he coins two new derisive epithets: κνισολοιχός and ὀλβιογάστωρ.

fr. 11 (11 K.)

Hesych. ε 6950
ε ὐ κ υ β ε ῖ ν (εὐκολεῖν cod., corr. Gronovius)· ὅπερ νῦν εὐβολεῖν. Ἄμφις ἐν Γυναικομανίᾳ

"t o b e l u c k y w i t h t h e d i c e" (εὐκυβεῖν); what we call today "to make a good throw with the dice" (εὐβολεῖν). Amphis (sc. uses this term) in "Madness for or of women".

Poll. 9.94
δυσκυβεῖν τε καὶ εὐκυβεῖν … δύσβολον καὶ εὔβολον to be unlucky with the dice (δυσκυβεῖν) and to be lucky with the dice (εὐκυβεῖν) … throwing badly with the dice (δύσβολον) and throwing luckily with the dice (εὔβολον).

Poll. 7.204
βόλων δὲ ὀνόματα τῶν μὲν φαύλων τε καὶ δυσβόλων ἐφ' οἷς τὸ δυσκυβεῖν … οἱ δὲ βελτίους, ἐφ' οἷς καὶ τὸ εὐκυβεῖν ἐλέγετο …

the appellations of the bad and unlucky dice casts, to which the verb "to be unlucky with the dice" (δυσκυβεῖν) applies, are the following … whereas the luckier casts, to which the verb "to be lucky with the dice" (εὐκυβεῖν) applies, are these: …

Metre Unknown

—⏑—

Discussion Meineke 3,305; Bothe 482; Kock 2,239; Edmonds 2,316f.; PCG 2,218; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 296

Citation Context The lemma εὐκυβεῖν occurs between the lemmata εὐκτόν and εὐκύκλους in Hesychius' lexicon. Laconic though it is, Hesychius' lemma provides us with multiple clues regarding εὐκυβεῖν:

i) an interpretation of this verb;

ii) that the term was used by Amphis and was probably his own coinage. Hesychius' phraseology, i. e. the very fact that he mentions Amphis' particular play as his (singular, apparently) source decisively points in this direction, implying that this occurrence is the archetypical one;

iii) that this term was considered obsolete in Hesychius' time (fifth-sixth century AD), having been replaced by the synonymous εὐβολεῖν.

It is almost certain that in his original text Amphis specifically used the infinitive (εὐκυβεῖν), rather than any other form of the verb, since Hesychius normally cites his lemmata in the exact form that he comes across them, i. e. without intervening to the case of a noun (cf. the following εὐκύκλους) or the tense of a verb (cf. further down, ε 6954 εὐλαβεῖσθαι and ε 6955 εὐλαβεῖτο).

Pollux' testimonies – even though they do not mention Amphis – prove equally useful, insofar as they indicate that no adjectives of the same root with εὐκυβεῖν were formed, known, or used. If there were any, Pollux would have included them in his lexicon; instead, the only adjectives that he cites are εὔβολος and δύσβολος, which are cognate to εὐβολεῖν. Interestingly, no same-root opposite verb to εὐβολεῖν is recorded (i. e. *δυσβολεῖν), but only δυσκυβεῖν, which is extremely rare; apart from the two occurrences in Pollux' lemmata, δυσκυβεῖν occurs only once more, in Ath. 15.666d (οἱ δυσκυβοῦντες).

Constitution of Text The manuscript tradition of Hesychius preserves the meaningless reading εὐκολεῖν (as if a verb *εὐκολέω existed), which breaks the alphabetic order of lemmata (εὐκολεῖν should have preceded εὐκτόν, instead of following it). The reading εὐκυβεῖν is Gronovius' correction (teste PCG 2,218). This is an insightful correction for three reasons; (i) it restores the alphabetical order of lemmata (εὐκτόν, εὐκυβεῖν, εὐκύκλους), (ii) it is a meaningful term (compound from εὖ + κύβος), (iii) it is paralleled in Pollux' work (9.94, 7.204).

Interpretation The κυβεία (dicing) was an ancient board game of chance. Despite being universally ill-reputed, dicing constituted a highly popular form of entertainment for Athenians. Its regular practice could easily turn into addiction and was typically interpreted as a symptom of general corruption, closely associated with a strong penchant for indulgence in other passions as well; cf. Aeschin. 1.42: δουλεύων ταῖς αἰσχίσταις ἡδοναῖς, ὀψοφαγίᾳ καὶ πολυτελείᾳ δείπνων καὶ αὐλητρίσι καὶ ἑταίραις καὶ κύβοις καὶ τοῖς ἄλλοις ὑφ' ὧν οὐδενὸς χρὴ κρατεῖσθαι τὸν γενναῖον καὶ ἐλεύθερον (being a slave to the most shameful pleasures, to gluttony and extravagance at table, to pipe-girls and hetairai, to dice, and to all those other things no one of which ought to have the mastery over a man who is well-born and free); Isoc. 7.48 οὐκ ἐν τοῖς σκιραφείοις οἱ νεώτεροι διέτριβον, οὐδ' ἐν ταῖς αὐλητρίσιν (the young men did not waste their time in the gambling-houses or with the pipe-girls), and Isoc. 15.287 οἱ δ' ἐν τοῖς καπηλείοις πίνουσιν, ἕτεροι δ' ἐν τοῖς σκιραφείοις κυβεύουσιν, πολλοὶ δ' ἐν τοῖς τῶν αὐλητρίδων διδασκαλείοις διατρίβουσιν (others are drinking in taverns, others are tossing dice in gambling-houses, and many are hanging about the training-schools of pipe-girls).

The comic poets regularly mention gambling with dice as a vice, e. g. Ar. V. 75 (φιλόκυβος: addicted to dicing), Pl. 243 (πόρναισι καὶ κύβοισι παραβεβλημένος: thrown away on whores and dice); Eup. fr. 99.85 (ὦ πανοῦργε καὶ κυβευτὰ σύ: you, knavish and dicer); Theopomp. fr. 63.1 (παῦσαι κυβεύων, μειράκιον: stop dicing, young man); Philetaer. fr. 2 (πρὸς τῷ ὀψοφαγεῖν καὶ κυβεύειν: inclined to gluttony and dicing), etc. For further analysis of dicing and other ancient Greek board games see Kurke (1999a) 247–298 and 1999b.

Apart from the present fragment, Amphis also wrote an entire play about dicing, The Dice-Players/Κυβευταί (ubi vide).

Dicing was regularly practised on many occasions in ancient Athens. A symposion or a visit to a κυβεῖον (gaming-house) are likely backgrounds for Amphis' current fragment. The speaker (of unidentifiable sex) comments on either his/her own or someone else's good luck at throwing dice.

εὐκυβεῖν Provided that Gronovius' correction is right (cf. "Constitution of Text"), the verb εὐκυβέω is Amphis' coinage, modelled upon εὐβολέω. Apart from this fragment, the infinitive εὐκυβεῖν occurs only in the lexica of Hesychius and Pollux (cf. "Citation Context" above); for Amphis' popularity among lexicographers see Intro. 3 ("Tradition & Reception").

Δακτύλιος (Daktylios)
("The Ring")

Discussion PCG 2,218; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 296

Title This is a popular play-title in Middle, New, and even Roman Comedy. Apart from Amphis, five other comic poets produced a Δακτύλιος: Alexis (cf. Arnott 1996: 153–155), Philemo, Timocles, Menander, along with an unidentifiable poet of the early second century BC (IG II^2 2323.133). In addition, Pomponius wrote a play called Anulus and Plautus wrote a Condalium. However, the scarce evidence from the above plays does not help us establish the role of the ring (though cf. Men. Δακτύλιος fr. 98, below).

But apart from these Δακτύλιος-plays, rings feature elsewhere in Comedy, in various passages, and this is where we draw the most material evidence regarding the ring's potential usage/role in Amphis' present play. In Aristophanes' Knights 947ff. we hear of the city-state's official signet-ring (δημοσία σφραγίς) changing hands between Paphlagon and the Sausage-Seller (this state seal was regularly entrusted in Athens for safe keeping to the ἐπιστάτης τῶν πρυτάνεων (head of the prytaneis); cf. Arist. Ath. 44.1, with Neil 1901: 133–134). In Thesmophoriazusae 424ff. Mica (in her invective against Euripides) longs for the uncomplicated and inexpensive (half-a-drachma) signet-rings that women used to use to secretly open all household doors (without their husbands noticing). In Wealth 883–885 we hear of an amulet ring (costing a drachma) that is supposed to provide some kind of supernatural protection (cf. van Leeuwen 1904: 131). In Eup. fr. 96 an amulet ring (δακτύλιος φαρμακίτης) features as an antidote / talisman against the evil eye; cf. Antiph. fr. 175.5.

These individual references to rings are contrasted with the Menandrean pattern regarding their usage and role. In what survives from Menander's plays, rings are stereotypically used as recognition tokens and, subsequently, prove paramount for the development of the plot. In Epitrepontes a lost-and-found ring helps clear a misunderstanding and reunite an exposed baby with its parents (Charisios [the owner of the ring] and Pamphile). Similarly, in Perikeiromene a ring reunites a brother (Moschion) with his twin sister (Glykera). Later, in Roman Comedy rings function as warrants (e. g. Plaut. Bacch. 327ff.) and as betrothal gifts (e. g. Ter. Ad. 347, for which Men. Δακτύλιος fr. 98 may be an antecedent, if the reference to a bridegroom has something to do with the title: οἰκόσιτον νυμφίον οὐδὲν δεόμενον προικός: a self-sustained bridegroom, resigning from his right to dowry).[8] On rings see further Boardman (2001) 189–302.

Evidently, we cannot retrospectively apply Menander's established pattern to Amphis' case. On the other hand, it is reasonable to assume that all (or some of) the Δακτύλιος-plays constituted sources of inspiration for Menander's dramaturgic technique. On balance, given (a) the lack of any indicative evidence from Amphis' play (only one fragment survives, consisting of two words) and (b) the absence of any dominant pattern in the other Δακτύλιος-plays, we cannot specify the nature of the ring's role within Amphis' play. We can only comment on the significance of its role, which must have been catalytic, since the entire play was named after it.

fr. 12 (12 K.)

Antiatt. κ 83 (Val. p. 201)
κ α τ ' ἀ γ ρ ό ν· ἀντὶ τοῦ ἐν ἀγρῷ. Ἄμφις Δακτυλίῳ

"a l o n g t h e f i e l d s"; instead of "in the fields". Amphis in "The Ring"

Metre Unknown
⏑–×

Discussion Meineke 3,305; Bothe 482; Kock 2,239; Edmonds 2,316f.; PCG 2,218; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 296

Citation Context The context is non-existent. The fragment forms part of a long and heterogeneous list of one- or two–word quotations under the letter kappa by Antiatticist. The list includes nouns, adjectives, infinitives, and verbs (in various tenses, numbers, and persons).

Antiatticist's lexicon is a Byzantine epitome of a longer treatise dating back to the second century AD. The author of the original treatise is believed to have drawn his material mainly from the work Περὶ τῶν ὑποπτευομένων μὴ εἰρῆσθαι τοῖς παλαιοῖς by Aristophanes of Byzantium. The author's aim was to prove the valid use of many Koine words in opposition to the rigid arguments of the "hard-core" atticists, who only approved of certain fifth-century words and expressions. Hence, Antiatticist's abridged version entails two quintessential drawbacks: (i) just like its original, it has a point to prove, and this takes away the quality of neutrality/objectivity (which a proper lexicon normally has); and (ii) just like every abridgement, it bears the additional risk of omitting much of the context. See further Dickey (2007) 97–98; Cassio (2012) 252–254; Valente (2015) esp. 31–59.

[8] Cf. in Menander's Dyscolus the parallel case of Kallipides (Sostratus' father), who refuses to accept from Gorgias any dowry when the latter marries Kallipides' daughter (ll. 845–847).

Interpretation Antiatticist uses Amphis and the latter's usage of the expression κατ' ἀγρόν as a (supposedly) valid example of interchangeable usage between ἐν + dative and κατά + accusative, in order to define the notion of locality. What Antiatticist means is that Amphis used the preposition κατά with the accusative to express what normally the preposition ἐν with the dative signifies. However, the context is entirely lost; hence this claim is to be treated cautiously.

The preposition ἐν takes only the dative and, when expressing a local notion, it means in, at, near, by, on, among (cf. Smyth 1956: §1687); e. g. ἡ ἐν Κορίνθῳ μάχη (the battle at Corinth; X. Ages. 7.5), οἰκῶν ἐν πόλει (living in the city; Alc. fr. 26), ἐν τῷ βαλανείῳ (in the bathhouse; Alex. fr. 106), ἐν ταῖς Ἀθήναις (in the city of Athens; Alex. fr. 9.2), etc. The preposition κατά with the accusative, when defining a local notion, means along, through, throughout (cf. Smyth 1956: §§ 1676, 1690); e. g. ἔπλεον κατὰ ποταμόν (they sailed downstream; Hdt. 4.44), καθ' ὅλην τὴν πόλιν (throughout the entire city; Lyc. 40), οὔτε κατὰ γῆν οὔτε διὰ θαλάσσης (neither by land nor by sea; Th. 1.2.2), προθυμίαν καὶ κατὰ γῆν καὶ κατὰ θάλατταν ὑπάρχουσαν (zealous spirit exhibited throughout both land and sea; X. HG 1.1.28–29). Ἐν with the dative signifies a stationary notion of locality, whereas κατά with the accusative signifies some kind of motion within / coverage of a given territory. The difference is clear-cut, and these two ways of defining local relationships are not interchangeable.

Since similar syntactical deviations and interchanged usages between ἐν and κατά are neither recorded in our primary sources nor registered as exceptions in any textbook of Greek grammar and syntax, this must have been a mistake by either Amphis or Antiatticist. Given (i) that Amphis gives us no reason to doubt his dexterity and correct usage of Greek language anywhere in his corpus (his resourcefulness never extends to syntax but only concerns the coinage of hapax terms, along with one case of grammatical deviation; cf. Intro. 6 "Language"), and (ii) that Antiatticist (and also the author of the original treatise) had an argument to validate (e. g. probably the loosening of strict language rules), it is highly probable that Amphis' text was deliberately misinterpreted and twisted already in the original treatise, in order to fit the author's pre-constructed theory. Antiatticist only reproduced and perhaps also shortened the evidence, by omitting any context that might have been present in the original.

Δεξιδημίδης (Dexidēmidēs)
("Dexidēmidēs")

Date in the 350s BC (s0 Webster 1952: 17–18)

Discussion Meineke 1,404f.; Kock 2,239; Breitenbach (1908) 50f.; Edmonds 2,318; PCG 2,218f.; Papachrysostomou 50–51

Title The name Δεξιδημίδης is a coinage by Amphis and was probably meant as a speaking (significant) name. The name Δεξιδημίδης is not attested anywhere else in our sources, literary or inscriptional. The closest paralell is Δεξίδημος (PAA 303382), which is attested only once, on a gravestone from Athens dated to the second haf of the fourth century BC. There is also a considerable number of names ending in -δημίδης from both the fifth and the fourth centuries BC (cf. the reverse indices in LGPN vols. I, II, and III.B). The evidence comes from Athens, Thessaly, Boeotia, Euboea, and the island of Thasos. From within the literary evidence worth mentioning is the name Καλλιδημίδης (Luc. DMort. 17); its latinized version "Callidemides" is used by Plautus (Trin. 916) and Terence (Hec. 432). Cf. also "Archidemides" in Plaut. Bacch. 250, 284 (cf. below) and Ter. Eun. 327.

The name Δεξιδημίδης is compound; its first component is the stem δεξ- (for δέξασθαι / δέχομαι; cf. LSJ[9] s. v.), which is commonly attested in names beginning with Δεξ-, Δεξε- and Δεξι–, e. g. Δεξικράτης (an Athenian comic playwright of the third century BC; PCG 5,16), Δέξανδρος (an Athenian consul at Mytilene, believed to have played a role in the island's revolt of 428 BC; Arist. Pol. 1304a), Δεξιόνικος (a hapax name, attested in an epigram by Rhianus, third century BC; AP 12.142.1), etc. The full list of these names is to be found in PA 3209–3241 and PAA 303280–303877; cf. Fick (1894) 91; Bechtel (1898) 118. The second component of Δεξιδημίδης is δῆμος. Hence, both this coinage and Amphis' dramaturgic technique form part of and perpetuate a long comic (mainly Aristophanic) tradition of coining names and other words from the Athenian Δῆμος. In Knights Aristophanes coins the diminutives δημακίδιον (823) and δημίδιον (726, 1199), as cajoling addresses to the personified Δῆμος. In Wasps 699 he creates the verb δημίζω, to refer to demagogues (δημιζόντων). Another instance is the figure of Βλεψίδημος in Wealth, whose name implies a "realistic political man" (Webster [2]1970: 15). All these Aristophanic coinages are heavily charged with political implications, and we may reasonably envisage the possibility that Amphis' play also had something to do with (contemporary) politics.

Two further examples of names with δῆμος as their second component are worth mentioning: (i) Ἀρχεδημίδης (< ἄρχω + δῆμος), the name of the eponymous archon in Athens for the year 464/3 BC (PAA 208825, PA 2314); intriguingly, this person, being a public official, did exactly what his name suggested. In addition, Plautus in Bacch. 284–285 treats the name "Archidemides" as a speaking name ("cum mi ipsum nomen eius Archidemides/ clamaret dempturum esse"); though he adapts it to Latin language, i. e. assuming the verb demo ("take away, filch") to be its second component. (ii) Pindar's second Nemean Ode (485 BC) praises the pancration athlete Τιμόδημος (< τιμέω + δῆμος) from the deme of Acharnai. Through this victory Timodemus – as if he was speaking out his name – honours his community (demos) and his descendants (Τιμοδημίδαι, Pi. N. 2.19).

Given the above parallel evidence, it is possible that Δεξιδημίδης was also a speaking (alias significant) name. Given its two constituents (i. e. δέχομαι and δῆμος), Δεξιδημίδης might allude to a wealthy person who entertained and treated people with hestiasis and other liturgies (just like Cimon is known to have done; cf. Plu. Per. 9). This could be either an entirely fictional character or a comic disguise for a real, contemporary person, e. g. just like Paphlagon stands for Cleon in Aristophanes' Knights, and Hyperbolus is targeted under the disguise of Marikas in Eupolis' Marikas. Edmonds (2,318) puts forward a concrete suggestion; he believes that Δεξιδημίδης "conceals the pro-Macedonian orator Demades" (PAA 306085, PA 3263), "who was in the pay of Philip", on the basis that "Dexi- suggests the taking of bribes". However, any attempt to identify the title-figure lacks further evidence. Whatever the case, it is likely that Amphis' present play dealt – to an unknown extent – with the contemporary social, economic, and perhaps also political, reality of fourth century Athens.

Date The one surviving fragment from this play features an instance of ὀνομαστὶ κωμῳδεῖν against Plato (see below). On account of this satirical reference to Plato, Webster (1952: 17–18) favours a date in the 350s BC for the production of the play. Nonetheless, the year of Plato's death (348/7 BC) is a precarious point of reference and may or may not be used as a terminus ante quem for the play's production date. We know that Comedy can ridicule the living and the dead alike, with the same fierce passion. Aristophanes accuses the dead Pericles in Acharnians (530ff.) and Peace (606ff.) for bringing war upon Greece; also in Peace (754ff.) he draws a vicious caricature of Cleon, who was killed in battle in Amphipolis just the previous year (422 BC). The use of present tense (οἶσθα) in Amphis' fragment may either suggest a production date during Plato's lifetime or be merely accidental (cf. "Interpretation" for Amphis fr. 13 below). Webster (1952: 17–18) is confident that Amphis' play was produced when Plato was still alive and, on this basis, he assigns the play "a date in the 50's". Yet, since we lack any solid evidence (regarding the play's plot, etc.) and given that Aristophanes produced an entire play out of two dead figures (Aeschylus and Euripides in Frogs), I would refrain from determining a definite date for Dexidemides.

fr. 13 (13 K.)

ὦ Πλάτων, ὡς οὐδὲν οἶσθα πλὴν σκυθρωπάζειν μόνον, ὥσπερ κοχλίας σεμνῶς ἐπηρκὼς τὰς ὀφρῦς

2 οἶσθα Diog. F: ἦσθα Diog. BPVΦ, Sud.: ᾖσθα Diog. Vit. Plat. 1907 p. 17[280] et Marcovich vol. 1, 1999: 210 3 σεμνῶς Diog. BP, Sud. AGMV: -ὸς, Diog. F, Sud. F

O Plato,
you know nothing but scowling, raising solemnly your eyebrows like a snail

D.L. 3.28
ἐν Δεξιδημίδῃ· ὦ — ὀφρῦς. Sud. σ 706 ὦ — ὀφρῦς

In "Dexidēmidēs": "O Plato — snail"

Metre Iambic trimeter

1. –⏑–
2. ––⏑– ⏑|–⏑– ––⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
3. ––⏑⏑– ––|⏑– ––⏑– (middle caesura)

Discussion Meineke 3,305f.; Bothe 482; Kock 2,239; Edmonds 2,318f.; PCG 2,219; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 296f.; Papachrysostomou 51–54

Citation Context The present fragment is cited by both Diogenes Laertius 3.28 and Suda σ 706. Diogenes Laertius quotes this fragment immediately after and within the same context as Amphis fr. 6 (ubi vide), i. e. within the section of comic fragments that draw a caricature of Plato. Suda copies directly here from Diogenes Laertius' text, which is one of Suda's numerous sources (see RE s. v. Suda esp. pp. 709–710, and Adler's introduction, vol. I (1928) xxi).

Constitution of Text For the manuscript tradition of Dioneges Laertius and the quality of the surviving codices see Intro. 3 ("Tradition & Reception"). In l. 2 Kassel & Austin adopt the reading οἶσθα, which is preserved only in Diogenes Laertius' codex F. The reading ἦσθα is preserved in codices B and P, as well as in the fragmentary codices V and Φ. Suda also preserves the reading ᾖσθα.

The study of some parallels weakens the case for ἦσθα and favours the case for οἶσθα. With the verb εἰμί, the predicate tends to be a noun, e. g. Ar. Lys. 139 οὐδὲν γάρ ἐσμεν πλὴν Ποσειδῶν καὶ σκάφη (we are nothing else but Poseidon and a tub); Ra. 227 οὐδὲν γάρ ἐστ' ἄλλ' ἢ κοάξ (you are nothing else but a "koax"); S. fr. 945.2 ὡς οὐδέν ἐσμεν πλὴν σκιαῖς ἐοικότες (we are nothing else but shapes of a shadow); E. fr. 25.2–3 γέροντες οὐδέν ἐσμεν ἄλλο πλὴν ὄχλος / καὶ σχῆμ' (we elders are nothing else but an annoyance and a shape). On the other hand, with the verb οἶδα the predicate tends to be an infinitive (with or without an article), e. g. Ar. Ra. 740 ὅστις γε πίνειν οἶδε καὶ βινεῖν μόνον (he only knows how to drink and screw); Alex. fr. 217.2 ὁ δὲ Διόνυσος οἶδε τὸ μεθύσαι μόνον (all Dionysus knows about is getting drunk; cf. Arnott 1996: 619–620, with a note on syntax). According to this pattern, the presence of the infinitive σκυθρωπάζειν in the present fragment tells in favour of the reading οἶσθα. (For the dubious case of Ar. Av. 19 see comm. on l. 2a.)

An additional element that may tell against the reading ἦσθα could be the absence of the particle ἄρα. Denniston, in what he calls "idiomatic usage" (1954: 36–37), notes that sentences that contain the imperfect, particularly of εἰμί, and seem to acknowledge something that has long been the case, are often reinforced by the particle ἄρα. Though not compulsory, ἄρα might have been expected. Cf. LSJ[9] s. v. ἄρα.

The reading ᾖσθα, first proposed by Breitenbach, Buddenhagen, Debrunner, and von der Muehll in their 1907 edition of the text (Diogenis Laertii Vita Platonis), and recently adopted by Marcovich (1999), though palaeographically close, is unparalleled.

In l. 3 codex F of Diogenes Laertius and codex F of Suda preserve the reading σεμνός, i. e. the adjective instead of the adverb σεμνῶς. The reading σεμνός is ruled out for metrical reasons; the omicron of σεμνός gives a brevis element where the metre requires a longum (long position of the second metre). In addition, σεμνὸς κοχλίας gives a rather weird meaning: solemn snail (as if the snail had a personality). The adverb σεμνῶς is preserved by Diogenes Laertius' codices B and P, and also by the majority of Suda's codices.

Interpretation The fragment is a direct address to Plato, the philosopher (and not to any other homonymous figure, provided that we trust D.L. 3.26). With all probability, Plato was a character in the play, though it does not necessarily follow that he was also alive when the play was produced (cf. "Date" above, and comm. on l. 1 below).

The fragment forms part of two comic traditions, the second encased within the first. The first is Comedy's satire against philosophy and philosophers in general; the second is Comedy's satire against the philosopher Plato in particular. Philosophers are already established as one of Comedy's favourite targets by the late fifth century (see Weiher 1913). Apart from the satire against Socrates by Aristophanes (mainly in Clouds, but also elsewhere, e. g. Av. 1281–1282; for Socrates in Clouds see Dover (1968) xxxii-lvii) and Amipsias (in Connus), several sophists were also mocked; cf. the derision of Protagoras in Eupolis' Kolakes (esp. frr. 157, 158); see further Carey 2000. During Middle (and also New) Comedy Plato emerges as the most popular philosophical figure to be satirised. No stereotype of Plato's comic presentation can be established. Comic mockery is commonly directed against his personality and habits as well as against his philosophy. For example, Alex. fr. 1 and Epicr. fr. 10 deride Plato's fondness of trivial definitions[9] (cf. Arnott 1996: 49–51); Alex. fr. 163 and Cratin.Jun. fr. 10 parody Plato's theories about the soul and its immortality; Anaxandr. fr. 20 satirises Plato's habit of eating the Academy's sacred olives; etc. Needless to say, this satirical presentation of Plato is counterbalanced by a different branch of the tradition (e. g. Diogenes Laertius, Plutarch, Stobaeus) that sees Plato favorably as a moderate and dignified philosopher; see Riginos (1976) 160–164. Of course, Plato is not Comedy's exclusive philosophical target. Other philosophers and schools are also satirises; e. g. the Pythagoreans (see Weiher 1913: 55–68; Papachrysostomou 2008: 123–143), Zeno and the Stoics (cf. Philem. fr. 88, Posidipp. fr. 16, Sopat. fr. 6), etc. See Webster ([2]1970) 50–56; Helm (1906) 375–386. On the changes in the nature of parody against philosophy from the fifth to the fourth century and beyond, see Imperio (1998) 120–130.

In the present fragment Amphis employs one of Old Comedy's defining attributes, i. e. the technique of ὀνομαστὶ κωμῳδεῖν. The speaker casts a personal gibe against Plato and accuses him of arrogance and hypocrisy. He pictures him raising his eyebrows, as a sign of solemnity and unwillingness to converse with anyone (cf. comm. on l. 2). At the same time, the phrase "you know nothing but scowling" additionally suggests that Plato is a mere appearance, a hypocrite. Likewise, in Ephipp. fr. 14 Plato's students are accused of cultivating the appearance of austerity and fake solemnity. It is noteworthy that these aspects of Plato's treatment, i. e. arrogance and the concern to present an intellectual façade, are longstanding commonplaces previously attributed to e. g. Socrates (by Aristophanes in Clouds) and Protagoras (by Eupolis in Kolakes as well as by Plato the philosopher[10]).

---

[9] Socrates is parodied for the same reason in Ar. Nu. 144ff.

[10] The recent volume (2013) by van Ophuijsen, van Raalte, and Stork (Protagoras of Abdera) challenges Plato's reports and seeks to reestablish the merit of Protagoras. Cf. de Romilly (1992) 101–103.

1 ὦ Πλάτων As a general rule, the vocative case of a proper name (or its equivalent) is typically used in Comedy to address a character who does appear in a given play (invocations to gods are excluded from this pattern). In particular, it is used in relation to: (i) a character who is currently present on stage (within the context of an ongoing dialogue): e. g. Ar. Ach. 462, Nu. 736; Alex. fr. 129.13; Bato fr. 4; (ii) a character who has just arrived / appeared on stage (as a greeting and/or as a way of identifying him): e. g. Ar. Ach. 99, Pax 520, Lys. 1097; (iii) a character that is about to appear (as a call / request to come forward): e. g. Ar. Ach. 400, Nu. 222; and (iv) a character currently absent from stage but who appears later in the play: e. g. Ar. Eq. 125. Intriguingly, the character(s) present on stage may be actually dead for some time in real life; see e. g. the cases of Eupolis' Dēmoi (where Solon, Miltiades, Aristides, and Pericles are brought on stage), Aristophanes' Frogs (where the setting is the Underworld from where Aeschylus is voted back to life), and Alex. fr. 9.1 (Solon has a speaking part). Cf. Alex. fr. 22 (a probable apostrophe to Archilochus, from the play Archilochus; cf. Arnott 1996: 112–114).

Nonetheless, the possibility of this being a passing address to an absent (from the stage and from the play) Plato – though highly unlikely – cannot be ruled out. A mostly instructive example as to how a commentator may be led astray by fragmentarily surviving evidence is Ar. Ach. 11: εἴσαγ', ὦ Θέογνι, τὸν χορόν (Theognis, bring the chorus in). Had we not the entire text of Acharnians intact or were this fragment isolated from its context (where we now know it is implanted as a piece of reported speech), we would assume that Theognis appeared in the Acharnians! Cf. Antiph. fr. 27, where the apostrophe ὦ Καλλιμέδων is directed to a crayfish ("Crayfish" being also the nickname of the politician Callimedon; we have no means to know whether he appeared in the play). Likewise, there can be no certainty as to whether the speaker in Amips. fr. 9 addresses a present or an absent Socrates.

It is noteworthy that Plato was the central hero and had a speaking part in another play of Middle Comedy, i. e. Aristopho's Plato; see Papachrysostomou (2008) 120–122. Yet, there is a single, much later, case of a speaker addressing an absent Plato: Ps.-Luc. Amor. 24.

With all probability, Plato did appear in Amphis' play as a speaking figure. But whatever the case, either present (εἰκόνι) or absent (λόγῳ), Plato was satirised here in the very way that he himself condemns and would like to see banned by law: (Lg. 935e): ποιητῇ δὲ κωμῳδίας … μὴ ἐξέστω μήτε λόγῳ μήτε εἰκόνι … μηδαμῶς μηδένα τῶν πολιτῶν κωμῳδεῖν (a comic poet should be strictly forbidden to ridicule any of the citizens in any way, either by word or by mimicry).

2a οὐδὲν οἶσθα πλήν Within Comedy this pattern (i. e. "you/someone know[s] nothing but…") is used three more times, and always with negative connotations, just like in the present fragment. Interestingly, two of these cases refer to Dionysus' tendency towards excess and to his habit of indulging in the pleasures of wine-drinking and sex (cf. "Constitution of Text"): Ar. Ra. 740 ὅστις γε πίνειν οἶδε καὶ βινεῖν μόνον (he [sc. Dionysus] only knows how to drink and screw); Alex. fr. 217.2 ὁ δὲ Διόνυσος οἶδε τὸ μεθύσαι μόνον (all Dionysus knows about is getting drunk; cf. Arnott 1996: 619–620). The third example occurs in Ar. Av. 19: τὼ δ' οὐκ ἄρ' ᾔστην οὐδὲν ἄλλο πλὴν δάκνειν (but they turned out to know nothing but biting); ᾔστην occurs only once as varia lectio against ἤστην of the manuscript tradition; for defence of ᾔστην see Dunbar (1995) 144. Regardless of the verb (ᾔστην or ἤστην), the predicate (δάκνειν) is a characteristic trait of birds' nature. Likewise, in the present fragment all that Plato allegedly knows about is something that pertains to his nature, i. e. lifting his eyebrows, a grimace that was widely associated with philosophers; cf. next note.

2b σκυθρωπάζειν] σκυθρωπάζω "look angry or sullen, be of a sad countenance" (LSJ[9] s. v.). This verb is used rather sporadically in ancient Greek literature. Within Comedy, apart from the present fragment, it occurs three more times; and, just like in the present fragment, it is always accompanied by an expression designating the raising of eyebrows (though philosophers are not the target): Ar. Lys. 7–8 (μὴ σκυθρώπαζ' … / … τοξοποιεῖν τὰς ὀφρῦς); Ar. Pl. 756 (ὀφρῦς συνῆγον ἐσκυθρώπαζόν θ' ἅμα); Antiph. fr. 217.2–3 (συναγαγόντα τὰς ὀφρῦς / … σκυθρωπάζοντα). There is also one comic instance of the adjective σκυθρωπός: Ar. Lys. 707 (without any comment about eyebrow-raising). Outside Comedy the verb σκυθρωπάζω occurs only once in tragedy (E. fr. 545a.9 as συσκυθρωπάζειν) and periodically elsewhere; e. g. X. Cyr. 6.2.21, Pl. Alc. 2 138a, D. 18.34, Aeschin. 1.83, etc.

3a ὥσπερ κοχλίας] ὁ κοχλίας "snail with a spiral shell" (LSJ[9] s. v.). Raising the eyebrows was a commonly seen and drawn grimace (cf. next note); but Amphis gives this ordinary grimace an innovative twist through an imaginative simile. He likens the eyebrows-raising person (Plato) to a snail; that is, the eyebrows are being paralleled to the snail's antenae. Just like a person raises and lowers their eyebrows, so a snail projects and retracts its antenae at will. Though this particular simile does not occur anywhere else, similes inspired from snails are not uncommon in Comedy. Drawing perhaps on Hesiod who describes the snail as φερέοικος (Op. 571), Anaxilas comes up with the following simile (fr. 33): ἀπιστότερος εἶ τῶν κοχλιῶν πολλῷ πάνυ, / οἳ περιφέρουσ' ὑπ' ἀπιστίας τὰς οἰκίας (you are much more suspicious than snails, which out of distrust carry their houses around with them). Philyllius also used a snail allegory, but the context is lost, and so is allegory's point (fr. 20): οὐκ εἰμὶ τέττιξ οὐδὲ κοχλίας, ὦ γύναι (I am neither a cicada nor a snail, woman); cf. Orth (2015) 234–237.

Snails are also mentioned as an aphrodisiac in Alex. fr. 281 (cf. Arnott 1996: 775–776), within a food list in Philyll. fr. 26 (cf. Orth 2015: 252–255), and again in Polioch. fr. 2.5 (cf. Orth 2015: 279–285).

Regarding grammar and syntax, Kassel & Austin ad loc. (2,219) suggest that κοχλίας is in accusative plural case. However, this would contradict the syntax. The participle ἐπηρκώς is in nominative case and it is compulsory that its subject(s) agree(s) with it. ἐπηρκώς has two subjects: Πλάτων and κοχλίας, both in nominative, for the term that follows ὥσπερ (as a comparison) must agree in number and case with the term to which is being compared; e. g. Pl. Phd. 100c ἐάν σοι συνδοκῇ ὥσπερ ἐμοί (if you agree with me). See Smyth (1956) §§ 2463–2465.

3b ἐπηρκὼς τὰς ὀφρῦς Raising the eyebrows was a grimace that expressed mainly arrogance and self-importance, occasionally combined with anger, (real or melodramatic) grief, or a status of deep meditation. This is exemplified in a plethora of cases: e. g. Ar. Ach. 1069, Eq. 631, V. 655, Lys. 7–8, Pl. 756; Cratin. fr. 348; Alex. fr. 16 (cf. Arnott 1996: 99); Antiph. fr. 217.2–3; Men. Sik. 160; E. Hipp. 290; D. 19.314. Both Hesychius and Photius interpret ὀφρυόεντες as ὑπερήφανοι; cf. Poll. 2.49, Suda τ 772.3, EM 762.7, etc. There are many expressions that denote the lifting of the eyebrows; cf. LSJ[9] s. v. ὀφρύς; Pearson on S. fr. 902 (1917: iii.86–87). The use of ἐπαίρω is fairly rare; apart from the present fragment, it is used (always in the perfect) twice more: in Euripides (dub./sp.) fr. 1113a.3 (ὀφρύν … ἐπηρκότα) and Bato fr. 5.13 (τὰς ὀφρῦς ἐπηρκότες).

This grimace and its negative implications were most commonly (though not exclusively) associated with philosophers, as a way of emphasizing their arrogance and deep meditation, which rendered them unavailable and unwilling to exchange a word with anyone. This is already part of the treatment of the sophists in Old Comedy (e. g. Eup. fr. 157 against Protagoras). Such an attitude is much parodied by Lucian in Nec. 5, where the philosophers are presented as not practising what they solemnly preach. Similarly, in the present fragment Plato is portrayed as an arrogant hypocrite. This feature of the philosophers constituted a good source of humour for Comedy. Philosophers are collectively described twice by Menander as οἱ τὰς ὀφρῦς αἴροντες (those who lift their eyebrows; frr. 37 and 349); likewise, Bato refers to them as οἱ γὰρ τὰς ὀφρῦς ἐπηρκότες (those who have raised their eyebrows; fr. 5.13). Additionally, in an epigram preserved by Hegesander (fr. 2, FHG iv.413; ap. Ath. 4.162a) philosophers are described by the hapax term ὀφρυανασπασίδαι (sons of those who raise their eyebrows). See further Weiher (1913) 47; Koster (1980) 227, n. 756; Di Marco (1989) 83, 177–179.

But apart from philosophers, two other groups are occasionally described as making a habit out of raising their eyebrows; fishmongers and generals. Attacks against fishmongers are a comic topos in Middle and New Comedy. They are accused mainly of being cunning and of charging exorbitant prices; Athenaeus collects almost all relevant evidence in Book 6.224c-228c. They are twice pictured as giving themselves airs by raising their eyebrows; in Antiph. fr. 217 and Alex. fr. 16 (cf. comm. on Amphis fr. 30). Generals in Comedy are directly charged only once with raising their eyebrows, in Alex. fr. 16 (along with fishmongers); but see also Ar. Ach. 1069 and Themist. Or. 8 p. 114^{b}7 H. (τὰς ὀφρῦς ἐπηρκότες μᾶλλον τῶν στρατηγῶν).

Finally, there is an interesting fragment by Diphilus (fr. 86.4), where Dionysus (and, allegorically, wine) is said to be able to overpower even the one (whoever that is) who raises his eyebrows and to make him laugh: τὸν τὰς ὀφρῦς αἴροντα συμπείθεις γελᾶν (you persuade the fellow with a haughty expression to laugh).

Διθύραμβος (Dithyrambos)
("The Dithyramb")

Discussion Meineke 1,373; PCG 2,219–221; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 297; Papachrysostomou 54–57

Title The title is unparalleled and open to multiple interpretations. But despite being unparalleled, it unavoidably lands in the very centre of a prominent Middle Comedy trend: the so-called "paradithyramb", i. e. the parody or – simply – the imitation of dithyrambic style (though the present play's surviving fragments are not examples of this trend). Comedy's practice of dithyrambic style consists of a recreational and per se usage of preposterously grandiloquent language, demonstrating the poet's dexterity; this trend was inspired by the changes introduced into the genre of Dithyramb during the fifth and fourth centuries BC.

Dithyramb was a form of choral lyric poetry. Most importantly, it was believed to have constituted the very beginning of dramatic poetry, and particularly tragedy; cf. Arist. Po. 1449a: καὶ ἡ μὲν (sc. ἡ τραγῳδία) ἀπὸ τῶν ἐξαρχόντων τὸν διθύραμβον (tragedy originates from the solo leaders of the dithyramb). Initially, dithyramb was a hymn dedicated to or otherwise closely associated with Dionysus (cf. Poll. 1.38, Pl. Lg. 700b). Archilochus (fr. 120 West) is the first to establish the relationship between the god and his song. Dionysus was typically assigned a foreign origin; either Lydian / Phrygian (E. Ba. 13ff., 86) or Thracian (E. Hec. 1267, Hdt. 7.111). Similarly, dithyramb was held to be of a Phrygian rhythm / metre (cf. Arist. Pol. 1342b). The poet Arion emerges as the first identifiable and historical figure who composed a literary dithyramb (though dithyramb already existed in pre-literary form, based on improvisation) between the years 625 and 585 BC, accompanied by dance and Satyrs (cf. Hdt. 1.23, Suda α 3886, Fasti I.208–211). Lasos of Hermione is credited with the establishment of dithyrambic contests in Athens under the tyrant Hipparchus (cf. Suda λ 139). By the fifth century BC dithyramb's content had shifted towards heroic narrative (cf. Pl. R. 394b-c), though it always kept its original connection (if only at least in theory) with Dionysiac cult. Dithyrambic contests were an integral part of the festivals of Great Dionysia, Thargelia, Anthesteria, Lesser Panathenaea, Prometheia, and Hephaesteia. In each festival there were two separate contests, one for men and one for boys. The contests were tribal; each Athenian tribe competed with its own chorus (of fifty members) in each age-group; i. e. there were ten tribal choruses of men and ten of boys. Cf. anc. scholia on Ar. Av. 1404: ἑκάστη γὰρ φυλὴ Διονύσου τρέφει διθυραμβοποιόν (each tribe provides for a dithyramb-writer for Dionysus). The tribal element of these contests is mentioned in fr. 14.6 below (cf. comm. ad loc.).

However, the changes that dithyramb underwent during the fifth and fourth centuries BC made the genre highly controversial. And it was not the shift of dithyramb's content from Dionysiac to heroic that incited controversy. The so-called "New Dithyramb" was primarily characterized by a mixture of different modes, interchange of melodies, excessive elaboration of music, and bombastic diction (cf. Pl. Lg. 700d-e, D.H. Comp. 19). Melanippides of Melos (second half of fifth century BC) was the first to launch a sequence of changes and innovations in the composition of dithyramb with the introduction of anabolai/lyric solos, resulting in the omission of antistrophes (cf. Arist. Pr. 19.15, Rhet. 1409a24, 1409b, Suda μ 454; OCD[4] s. v. Melanippides[(2)]). A number of poets carried on with the changes initiated by Melanippides; the most influential and prominent among them were Philoxenus of Cythera (c. 435–380 BC; OCD[4] s. v. Philoxenus[(1)]) and Timotheus of Miletus (c. 450–360 BC; OCD[4] s. v. Timotheus[(1)]). Cf. Timotheus' arresting manifesto (fr. 796.1–2 PMG): οὐκ ἀείδω τὰ παλαιά, καινὰ γὰρ ἁμὰ κρείσσω (I do not sing according to the old mode, but the new, better one of mine); see also the ancient scholia on Ar. Pl. 290 about Philoxenus' Cyclops (frr. 815–824 PMG), and Antiph. frr. 205, 207. On Timotheus see Hordern's commented edition (2002) passim.

Already in Pherecrates there is evidence for these changes (fr. 155.3; the speaker is the personified figure of Music): ἐμοὶ γὰρ ἦρξε τῶν κακῶν Μελανιππίδης (Melanippides was the first who initiated this wrongdoing against me). Aristophanes attacked New Dithyramb on a regular basis, particularly with relation to the genre's elaborate and pompous style; e. g. Av. 904–957, 1372–1409, and Nu. 331–338 (cf. Zimmermann 1992: 118–121); Pax 828–831 (cf. anc. sch. on l. 831; ad hoc Aristophanic coinage: διθυραμβοδιδάσκαλος); Pl. 290ff. (cf. Zimmermann 1992: 127–128), etc. Plato's hostility is striking (Lg. 700d-e, R. 397a); on the contrary, Xenophon (Mem. 1.4.3.) seems to have admired the dithyrambic poets, and Melanippides in particular. For further analysis of dithyramb and for discussion of various aspects of its nature and performance settings, see Schönewolf (1938) passim; Schmidt (1845) passim; Pickard-Cambridge ([2]1962) 1–59; Barker (1984) i.93–98; Pickard-Cambridge ([3]1988) 74–79; Zimmermann (1992) passim (esp. 117–147); Imperio (1998) 75–95; Hordern (2002) 17–43; Barker 2004; Csapo 2004; Kowalzig & Wilson (2013) passim.

The treatment of dithyramb by Middle (and Old) Comedy is thoroughly covered by Nesselrath (1990) 241–266. In this extensive analysis Nesselrath studies the aforementioned phenomenon of "paradithyramb" in its details. The primary stereotypical features of dithyrambic style, as practised and/or parodied by Comedy, include the presence of extravagantly compound adjectives, far-fetched metaphors, riddling language, metrical regularity (e. g. no or scarce resolutions), and verbal repetition; cf. Hunter (1983) 19–20, 166–167; Arnott (1996) 348–350. Although the practice of paradithyramb can already be intermittently detected in plays of Old Comedy (e. g. Ar. Ec. 1–18, Pl. 515), it is primarily one of Middle Comedy's defining attributes; cf. ancient scholia on Ar. Pl. 515: ἤδη τὸ ἔπος τοῦτο τῆς μέσης κωμῳδίας ὄζει (this language smells like Middle Comedy already). Dithyrambic style – with or without a satirical element (which cannot always be detected with certainty) – is best exemplified in the following comic fragments: Eub. fr. 75, Antiph. fr. 216, Alex. fr. 124, Aristopho fr. 13, Anaxandr. fr. 31, Epicr. fr. 7, Xenarch. fr. 1; cf. Meineke 1,290–304. See also the comprehensive synopsis of dithyramb by Zimmermann, Der Neue Pauly, s. v. Dithyrambos.

It is against this rich background that we need to interpret the title of Amphis' present play. Although other interpretations are possible (cf. below), the most straightforward one would be to understand the title as referring to dithyramb the song, perhaps personified and with possible allusions to the innovations it underwent (Kaibel RE 1.2 s. v. Amphis nr. 2). This interpretation can have further implications when combined with the evidence from one of the play's surviving fragments, fr. 14. There is a good possibility that Dionysus himself is speaker A in this fragment (see comm. ad loc.); a reasonable assumption (based on the fragment's content) is that the play presented Dionysus as a διδάσκαλος, a trainer of dithyrambic chorus for dithyrambic contests. If so, this would be an essentially metadramatic play. This kind of metadramatic content, i. e. comedy taking as its theme – in whole or in part – the staging of a dramatic performance, can be paralleled by those cases where comedy stages tragedy; cf. Aristophanes' Proagon that staged the performance of tragedy and probably featured Euripides as one of his characters (cf. Kock 1,510 and anc. sch. on Ar. V. 66; on proagon ceremony see Pickard-Cambridge [3]1988: 67–68). Taplin (1993: 55–66) offers a persuasive argument for a similar context lying behind the Choregoi vase.

At the same time, other interpretations of the title cannot be ruled out. Gulick (1928: 295; on Ath. 4.175a) suggested that the title indicates not the song but Dionysus himself; after all, Διθύραμβος was one of the god's cult epithets (cf. E. Ba. 526). Alternatively, Webster ([2]1970: 83) suggested that the title might refer to a Satyr with that name from among the thiasos of Dionysus. This hypothesis receives some support from a vase fragment (CIG 7464), where the name Διθύραμφος is assigned to a Satyr. There is also an intriguing fragment by Aeschylus (fr. 355: μειξοβόαν πρέπει / διθύραμβον ὁμαρτεῖν / σύγκωμον Διονύσῳ), where dithyramb is described as a fellow-reveler (σύγκωμος) of Dionysus. The verb ὁμαρτέω can variably mean accompany/attend (of things), but also accompany/walk beside (of people); cf. LSJ[9] s. v. Hence the subject can either be a thing (dithyramb as the song) or a person (a Satyr or Dithyramb as the song personified).

Whatever the exact significance of the title, the play featured the introduction of the giggras pipe (mentioned in fr. 14) as one of the innovations (καινὸν ἐξεύρημα) witnessed within the genre of dithyramb during the fourth century BC.

fr. 14 (14 K.)

ἐγὼ δὲ τὸν γίγγραν γε τὸν σοφώτατον.
(B.) τίς δ' ἔσθ' ὁ γίγγρας; (A.) καινὸν ἐξεύρημά τι ἡμέτερον, ὃ θεάτρῳ μὲν οὐδεπώποτε ἔδειξ', Ἀθήνησιν δὲ κατακεχρημένον 5 ἐν συμποσίοις ἤδη 'στί. (B.) διὰ τί δ' οὐκ ἄγεις εἰς τὸν ὄχλον αὐτό; (A.) διότι φυλὴν περιμένω σφόδρα φιλονικοῦσαν λαχεῖν τιν'. οἶδα γὰρ ὅτι πάντα πράγματ' ἀνατριαινώσει κρότοις

1 γίγγραν γε Jacobs: -αντε A 4 ἔδειξ' Erfurdt (1812) 454: ἐδείχθη A 5 ἤδη 'στί Dindorf: ἥδιστον A 8 ἀνατριαινώσει Dindorf: -αίνωσι A: -αινώσω Kock

And I, for one, the most cleverly devised giggras.
(B.) But what is a "giggras"? (A.) A new invention of mine, which I have never yet presented at the theatre, although in Athens it has already become 5 fashionable at banquets. (B.) Why don't you bring it forth then to the crowd? (A.) Because I am waiting to be alloted a tribe that is really fond of victory. For I know that it will shake with applause everything as with a trident

Ath. 4.174f-175b
γιγγραίνοισι γὰρ οἱ Φοίνικες ... ἐχρῶντο αὐλοῖς ... ὀξὺ καὶ γοερὸν φθεγγομένοις. τούτοις δὲ καὶ οἱ Κᾶρες χρῶνται ἐν τοῖς θρήνοις ... ὀνομάζονται δὲ οἱ αὐλοὶ γίγγροι ὑπὸ τῶν Φοινίκων ἀπὸ τῶν περὶ Ἅδωνιν θρήνων· τὸν γὰρ Ἅδωνιν Γίγγρην καλεῖτε ὑμεῖς οἱ Φοίνικες, ὡς ἱστορεῖ Δημοκλείδης. μνημονεύει τῶν γίγγρων αὐλῶν Ἀντιφάνης ἐν Ἰατρῷ καὶ Μένανδρος ἐν Καρίνῃ, Ἄμφις τ' ἐν Διθυράμβῳ λέγων οὕτως· ἐγὼ — κρότοις.

The Phoenicians used to play the "giggrainoi" pipes … which produce a shrill and mournful sound. The Carians also use these in laments. … These pipes are called "giggroi" by the Phoenicians because of the laments for Adonis; for you, Phoenicians, you call Adonis by the name of "Giggres", as Democleides testifies (FGrH 794 F 8). "Giggras" pipes are mentioned by Antiphanes in "The Doctor" (fr. 107), Menander in "The Carian dirge-singer" (fr. 203), and Amphis in "The Dithyramb" as follows: "And — trident".

Metre Iambic trimeter

1. ⏑–⏑– ––⏑|– ⏑–⏑– (hephthemimeral caesura)
2. ––⏑– –|–⏑– ––⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
3. –⏑⏑⏑⏑ ––⏑|– ⏑–⏑– (hephthemimeral caesura)
4. ⏑–⏑– ––⏑|⏑⏑ ––⏑– (hephthemimeral caesura)
5. ––⏑– ––⏑|⏑⏑ ⏑–⏑– (hephthemimeral caesura)
6. –⏑⏑⏑– ⏑|⏑⏑⏑– –⏑⏑⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
7. ⏑⏑–⏑– ––|⏑– ⏑–⏑– (middle caesura)
8. ⏑⏑–⏑– ⏑|⏑⏑⏑– ––⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)

Discussion Meineke 3,306; Bothe 482; Kock 2,239f.; Edmonds 2,318f.; PCG 2,219f.; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 297f.; Papachrysostomou 57–62

Citation Context The following fragment is cited by Athenaeus 4.175a-b, within a discussion about wind-, string-, and percussion instruments, which starts at 4.174a following the hearing of the sound of an ὕδραυλις (hydraulis, "water-organ"). The speaker is a musician, Alceides from Alexandria, who takes this opportunity to make a scornful apostrophe to Ulpian, who drew his origin from Tyre; cf. ὑμεῖς οἱ Φοίνικες (you, the Phoenicians; Ath. 4.174f). Athenaeus mentions a particular type of pipe, the γιγγράινος or γίγγρας αὐλός, as being popular among the Phoenicians and the Carians. The form γιγγράινος is mentioned only once by Athenaeus (4.174f; and nowhere else in our sources), whereas in Athenaeus' following text the alternative form γίγγρας is used. Athenaeus etymologises the term γίγγρας as relating to Γίγγρης, the Phoenician appellation for Adonis (τὸν γὰρ Ἄδωνιν Γίγγρην καλεῖτε ὑμεῖς οἱ Φοίνικες); cf. Poll. 4.76. In order to demonstrate the nature and function of this giggras pipes, Athenaeus quotes Amphis' present fragment, and also refers to Antiph. fr. 107 and Men. fr. 203. Nevertheless, neither Antiphanes' nor Menander's own words survive (i. e. the respective fragments consist merely of Athenaeus' claim). Hence Amphis' fragment is the only surviving literary text (other than Athenaeus' synopsis and various lexicographical enties; cf. below), where this kind of pipe is being mentioned in context. Axionicus fr. 3, quoted by Athenaeus immediately afterwards (4.175b), refers to μέλη γιγγραντά (songs composed for- and sung to the music of giggras). See Barker (1984) i.262–263.

Constitution of Text In l. 1 Kassel & Austin adopt Jacobs' suggestion γίγγραν γε (1809: 113): "vereor, ut aposiopesis locum habeat. Verbum ex praecedentibus subaudiendum. Pro τε mallem γε". Indeed, the confirmatory force of γε is an appropriate match for the antithesis introduced by ἐγὼ δέ. In l. 4 Erfurdt's suggestion ἔδειξ' makes better syntactical sense than the unmetrical ἐδείχθη (preserved by codex A); whilst speaker A explains the nature of his καινὸν ἐξεύρημα, the usage of first person (ἔδειξ') within the following reference clause is more apposite than ἐδείχθη (as if someone else were to present the speaker's own invention, of which the speaker is so proud). Additionally, ἐδείχθη is unmetrical; it produces one extra longum (-η), which cannot be accommodated in the verse. In l. 5 codex A preserves the reading ἥδιστον. Instead, Dindorf's resourceful conjecture ἤδη 'στί is preferred, for it serves well both the meaning and the syntax; 'στί combines with the participle κατακεχρημένον to form a periphrastic perfect tense (κατακεχρημένον (ἐ)στί), while the temporal adjective ἤδη comes as a most appropriate complement to the perfect tense (it has already been overused/ become fashionable). In l. 8 Dindorf's ἀνατριαινώσει is preferred to Kock's ἀνατριαινώσω, for the subject continues to be (since l. 2) the καινὸν ἐξεύρημα, whose nature and potential is outlined by speaker A. In addition, ἀνατριαινώσει is palaeographically closer to the manuscript tradition (ἀνατριαίνωσι).

Interpretation The fragment focuses on a particular kind of pipe, the giggras. This is one of those rare cases where the surviving material from a play bears direct relation to the play's title; for the pipe (αὐλός) was the instrument par excellence that normally accompanied dithyramb; cf. ps.-Plu. de Mus. xxix 1141b-c, Pratinas fr. 1 PMG. See Pickard-Cambridge (^{2}1962) 1–59; Wilson (1999) 75–95. The fragment refers to an allegedly brand-new (at least for Athens) kind of pipe, the giggras. Γίγγρας was a small pipe (of a length of an open, stretched palm), with a high-pitched and plaintive tone, of Phoenician (Poll. 4.76; Ath. 4.174f) or Carian (cf. Phot. γ 116) origin. The giggras pipe was so named after Adonis, whom the Phoenicians called Γίγγρας (or Γίγγρης; Ath. 4.175a). Speaker A appears as the inventor of this strange, eastern-associated pipe (καινὸν ἐξεύρημα ἡμέτερον), whereas his collocutor is entirely ignorant of it (l. 2). The potential of this new invention is predicted to be startling, destined to lead to hysterical frenzy (l. 8). The fact that giggras is associated with Adonis (cf. Atallah 1966) allows us to assume that it is probably a late fifth century arrival in Athens. This may explain the date of our earliest references to it (i.e. Middle Comedy); if so, it was probably still perceived as a recent development, which explains why speaker B is presented as ignorant of it. The context of discussion is quintessentially Athenian; speaker A can be safely identified as a professional dithyrambic trainer (διδάσκαλος), who saves his new invention (περιμένω; l. 6) for when he is assigned to train a dithyrambic chorus of a competitive tribe. On the multifaceted nexus between the dithyrambic poet / teacher and the Athenian city, see Ieranò 2013.

Regarding the speakers' specific identity, there is a good case to be made for speaker A being Dionysus himself (so Gulick 1928: 295, on Ath. 4.175a). Not only is this a logical assumption that receives major support from the text itself (cf. comm. s. v. ἡμέτερος), but it also has generic implications, in that it makes Dionysus a character in a comic play, portrays him as the god of theatre (which he was), and presents him in a typically Athenian way (i. e. being well versed in symposia and dithyrambic contests). In other words, Dionysus, the god of dithyramb par excellence, is being portrayed as having invented (alias, introduced to Athens from the East) a new kind of pipe to accompany his dithyrambic songs. Comedy loved staging Dionysus (cf. Aristophanes' Βάτραχοι, Βαβυλώνιοι, and Διόνυσος Ναυαγός; Cratinus' Διονυσαλέξανδρος and Διόνυσοι; Eupolis' Ταξίαρχοι; Διόνυσος by Eubulus, Alexander, Magnes, and Timocles; Διονύσου Γοναί by Demetrius I, Anaxandrides, and Polyzelus; Διόνυσος Ἀσκητής by Aristomenes, cf. Orth 2014: 71–73).[11] Besides, the presence of the possessive pronoun ἡμέτερος (l. 3) along with ἐξεύρημα (l. 2) gives the speaker both a proprietary interest in the object and a claim to its invention; and this severely restricts the number of candidates for the speaker of this sentence. The obvious contenders to Dionysus are (i) Marsyas: unlikely; no connection with the theatre whatsoever; (ii) Athena: possible but again not connected with the theatre and only rarely found in Comedy (within the surviving comic material only Hermippus' Αθηνᾶς Γοναί seems to have dealt with Athena in some considerable extent); (iii) a human connected with the Athenian theatre, e. g. playwright, musician, dithyramb-writer (διθυραμβοποιός: so Edmonds 2,318f.): possible but difficult therefore to see why he says Ἀθήνησιν instead of e. g. ἐνθάδε.

If speaker A is Dionysus, then speaker B could be another god, possibly Poseidon (see further comm. s. v. ἀνατριαινώσει). Accordingly, the dramatic action could be taking place in a divine environment, e. g. Olympus. Although the phraseology (l. 4) does not entirely rule out Athens as the scene's setting (cf. comm. s. v. Ἀθήνησιν), it is much more likely that the scene is taking place somewhere other than Athens (and not necessarily on Earth). It is a possibility that Amphis' play took place – either entirely or in part – on Olympus; if so, Aristophanes' Peace and Frogs would be the obvious antecedents (split action between Olympus and Earth and between Earth and Underworld respectively).

[11] Tragedy had already staged Dionysus, with Euripides' Bacchae being our best surviving evidence; cf. Dodds ([2]1960: xxv-xxx) for evidence about other Dionysiac plays.

1a γίγγραν A small eastern pipe of piercing sound, and the reason why Athenaeus quotes the entire fragment; cf. "Citation Context" and "Interpretation" above. Barker (1984 i.263, n. 13) suggests that the giggras "was in some way related to instruments of the organ family, being perhaps a small bellows-blown device", like the hydraulis. Hesychius (γ 559) records the alternative form γίγγρος. The dance that accompanied the music played by giggras pipes was also called γίγγρας, after the pipe itself (cf. Tryphon fr. 113 Velsen [ap. Ath. 14.618c]; Poll. 4.102).

1b σοφώτατον The adjective σοφός means cleverly devised, wise (cf. LSJ[9] s. v.), when used with reference to inanimate things (as opposed to persons). Dover (1968: 106) points out that "σοφία in Aristophanes, and in the fifth century generally, most commonly denoted an active, creative skill or artistry, for which knowledge, practice, and native wit are all required"; e. g. in Ar. Eq. 885–886 Peiraeus walls are – ironically – described as Themistocles' σοφὸν ἐξεύρημα (a clever piece of policy; cf. comm. on l. 2b below). Accordingly, in the present fragment giggras is characterised as σοφώτατος (in the superlative).

The present case (a creator taking pride in his accomplishment) is closely paralleled by Ar. Nu. 522 (though periphrasis is used; i. e. adverb σοφώτατα + ἔχειν): ταύτην σοφώτατ' ἔχειν τῶν ἐμῶν κωμῳδιῶν (this being the most cleverly devised of my comedies). Here Aristophanes – within the Parabasis – praises his own play Clouds (referring to the first, non-surviving, version, which took third prize – to his disappointment).

Elsewhere in Comedy the adjective σοφός in the superlative is often used humorously or in order to cajole someone (in an attempt of captatio benevolentiae), and is variably ascribed to Hermes (Pax 428), the audience (Nu. 575), the chorus (Pax 603), a group of wine fellow-drinkers (Lys. 1227), etc.

2a τίς δ' ἔσθ'… This question suggests that speaker B had never heard of this term before (γίγγρας). Although it is not necessary that the audience shared his complete ignorance, the question implies that giggras pipes were recently introduced in Athens. Parallel cases where comic characters are puzzled when listening to an unfamiliar term occur in Amphis fr. 27 (μίνδαξ: a kind of incense), Strato fr. 1.34 (οὐλοχύται: barley-groats sprinkled over the sacrificial animal victim), and Philem. fr. 45 (ναβλᾶς: the player of the stringed musical instrument νάβλα) and fr. 130 (βουνός: Cyrenaic word for hill). On Philemo's penchant for the unusual see Bruzzese (2011) 272–280.

2b καινὸν ἐξεύρημα The "new invention" is the giggras pipe, in which his inventor (speaker A) takes pride (still the indefinite pronoun τι that immediately follows has a self-deprecating force, since it softens the assertion and makes the statement sound more modest; in addition, it serves the metre). As mentioned in the discussion of the title above, the play featured the introduction of this new pipe, probably as one of the changes recently introduced into the dithyrambic genre. A similar self-referential case occurs already in Pherecrates (fr. 84), where the poet speaks of an actual invention of his, i. e. the Pherecratean verse (– – – ⏑ ⏑ – –).

Additionally, there are three further comparable instances from within the Aristophanic corpus (in cases i and ii ἐξεύρημα is combined with σοφός): (i) Eq. 885–886: σοφὸν κἀκεῖν' ὁ Πειραιεύς … / … ἐξεύρημα (cf. comm. on l. 1b above). The reference is to the construction of the Peiraeus walls by Themistocles (cf. Th. 1.93.3–7), which is described as a wisely devised political initiative; (ii) Ec. 578: δεῖται † γάρ τοί γε † σοφοῦ τινος ἐξευρήματος ἡ πόλις ἡμῶν (our city needs a clever (sc. political) plan; i. e. the play's core issue: city administration is taken over by women); (iii) V. 1052–1053: τοὺς ζητοῦντας / καινόν τι λέγειν κἀξευρίσκειν (those who seek to find something fresh to say; this is a piece of advice to the audience to cherish poets who seek new ideas). Cf. Alex. fr. 178 where a boastful cook describes κάνδαυλος (a sumptuous Lydian dish) as θαυμαστὸν ἐμὸν ἐξεύρημα (a preposterous claim; cf. Arnott 1996: 526). In E. IT 1029 the phrase καινὸν ἐξεύρημα is also used to describe a new idea brought forward by Iphigenia.

Furthermore, the present reference to a "new invention" relates (albeit rather peripherally) to the motif of πρῶτος εὑρετής, which features repeatedly within Comedy in several variations; e. g. See Kleingünther (1933); Arnott (1996) 122 (bibliography and examples).

3a ἡμέτερον This is one of the rare cases where ἡμέτερος is used instead of ἐμός (LSJ[9] s. v. II). This exceptional usage of the pronoun substantiates the hypothesis presented in "Interpretation" above about Dionysus being the speaker in Amphis' fragment. Eubulus fr. 93 constitutes a strong parallel; here the speaker is Dionysus (cf. Ath. 2.36b: Εὔβουλος δὲ ποιεῖ τὸν Διόνυσον λέγοντα); and he employs the pronoun ἡμέτερος instead of ἐμός (l. 7). Hunter ad loc. (1983: 188) points out that "in Comedy the use of ἡμέτερος for ἐμός is restricted to grand style or to important personages such as Dionysus; cf. Bain (1977) 198–200". Likewise, in Amphis' fragment Dionysus could be using the "royal we", thus speaking on behalf of all theatre producers and poets (comic and dithyrambic), as their patron deity.

The exceptional usage of ἡμέτερος for ἐμός is first attested in Homer; e. g. Od. 4.101, 9.93, 11.562, etc.

3b οὐδεπώποτε "Never yet at any time". As LSJ[9] s. v. note, this adverb is usually employed with reference to the past, as it is here. In some cases this adverb possesses an additional emphasizing and confirmatory force, which makes it sound stronger than its synonym οὐδέποτε. For example, in Ar. Pl. 193 Chremylus is absolutely sure that no one ever got their fill of wealth; and Blepsidemus (l. 404) is equally sure that he has never been rich himself. Likewise, speaker B in Alex. fr. 178 uses οὐδεπώποτε to stress his complete ignorance (as in I've never heard of it before) regarding the term κάνδαυλος (sumptuous Lydian dish) mentioned by speaker A (cf. comm. on 2b above).

4a Ἀθήνησιν This reference to Athens as a locus has significant implications upon the scene's (and the play's) setting (cf. "Interpretation"). As a general rule, we do not normally expect Athens to be designated, unless it is not the play's setting. The locative adverb Ἀθήνησιν occurs only once more within the surviving comic corpus, in Diph. fr. 67.2, where it is contrasted with ἐνταῦθα (here; l. 5); i. e. beyond any doubt in Diphilus' fragment dramatic action took place somewhere other than Athens. In Ar. Av. 36 Euelpides refers to Athens as ἐκείνην τὴν πόλιν, as he and Peisetaerus are already on their way, leaving Athens behind. Furthermore, in Alex. fr. 9 the locative designation ἐν ταῖς Ἀθήναις occurs (spoken by the non-Athenian Aesop addressing the Athenian Solon); Arnott ad loc. (1996: 75–76) explores the possibilities of a non-Athenian background. Cf. Alexis fr. 224.2 (with Arnott 1996: 627). Noteworthy though are Kock's (2,300) references to Ar. Ach. 729, 829 and Lys. 170, as examples of cases where non-Athenians refer to Athens whilst finding themselves in it. As mentioned in "Interpretation" above, the possibility of an Athenian background is far less likely than a non-Athenian one; especially when combined with the argument in favour of Dionysus being speaker A.

4b κατακεχρημένον Perfect participle, passive mood of the verb καταχράομαι in absolute sense, in what appears to be a fairly infrequent usage of the verb; LSJ[9] s. v. cite only Amphis' present fragment as an example; cf. also Plu. 818b. This exceptional usage of καταχράομαι has certain additional implications, i. e. it means "heavily / frequently used", "used until it is worn out / hackneyed". Particularly, the use of the perfect is significant in that it emphasises the impression that this has been the case for some time now.

6 ὄχλον Although the term ὄχλος can have negative connotations when used in political sense (mob, populace; as opposed to δῆμος: people), here it is used neutrally to designate the crowd (cf. LSJ[9] s. v.), as elsewhere (cf. multiple examples LSJ[9] s. v. I). Most commonly ὄχλος is accompanied by a genitive of material; e. g. Ar. V. 540 (πρεσβυτῶν ὄχλος), Ra. 676 (λαῶν ὄχλον), Ec. 383 (ἀνθρώπων ὄχλος); X. Cyr. 6.1.26 (ὄχλος τῶν στρατιωτῶν), etc. But in the present fragment ὄχλος is used substantively, just like e. g. Ar. Pl. 750 and Anaxandr.

fr. 55. This latter fragment by Anaxandrides presents a further fascinating convergence with Amphis' present fragment, in terms of content; the speaker argues that new inventions should be brought forward to the public (ὄχλος): ἡδονὴν ἔχει, / ὅταν τις εὕρῃ καινὸν ἐνθύμημά τι, / δηλοῦν ἅπασιν· … / … χρὴ γὰρ εἰς ὄχλον φέρειν / ἅπανθ' ὅσ' ἄν τις καινότητ' ἔχειν δοκῇ (it's a pleasure when someone comes up with a new invention to reveal it to everybody; … for one should bring to the public everything that involves some novelty). Behind this thoughtful concern of sharing new ideas and bringing new inventions to the public there is a subtle political (democratic) implication, best exemplified in E. Supp. 438–441: τίς θέλει πόλει / χρηστόν τι βούλευμ' ἐς μέσον φέρειν ἔχων; καὶ ταῦθ' ὁ χρῄζων λαμπρός ἐσθ'… / … τί τούτων ἔστ' ἰσαίτερον πόλει; (who has some useful counsel and is willing to bring it forward publicly? Anyone who chooses to do so becomes illustrious … Could it be any greater equality than this in a city?); cf. Hdt. 4.97, D. 18.139.

6–7 φυλὴν … λαχεῖν The speaker (whatever his identity and location are) is definitely someone who is well versed in Athens' dithyrambic – and theatrical – affairs. In these lines he refers to the actual nature and the typical procedure of dithyrambic contests; the contests were tribal (φυλήν), and drawing lots (λαχεῖν) was an integral part of the assignment of dithyrambic poets / trainers (διδάσκαλοι) to tribes. However, against passages that imply drawing lots (e. g., apart from the present fragment, Antipho 6.11), there are other passages that suggest some kind of selective choice, such as Ar. Av. 1404 (ταῖσι φυλαῖς περιμάχητος: fought for among the tribes) as well as D. 21.13 (regarding the choice of pipe-players). This seeming contradiction has been noted by scholars, who attempted to reconcile the ancient testimonies; cf. Schmidt (1845) 247–248; Pickard-Cambridge ([2]1962) 35–38 and ([3]1988) 75–76; Dunbar (1995) 672; Wilson (2000) 65–70. With all probability, the procedure of assigning didaskaloi to the tribes consisted of a combination of vote and lot, in two stages; i. e. in stage one the tribes severally selected a number of candidates through a preliminary vote, and in stage two election by lot took place from among these candidates. Such combination of vote and lot was widely practised in Athens for various political offices and the Athenians were familiar with this since, at least, Solon's time; the officers thus designated were known as κληρωτοὶ ἐκ προκρίτων; cf. Arist. Ath. 8.1.

7 φιλονικοῦσαν This is the only occurrence of the verb φιλονικέω within both the comic and the tragic corpus. The verb is mostly used in negative sense; i. e. engage aggressively in contentious rivalry (cf. LSJ[9] s. v. with examples). In the present fragment though it is used in positive sense meaning to be fond of victory; cf. X. Cyr. 1.4.15, Plu. Arist. 8.3.

8a πράγματ' The reference is primarily to theatrical/ dramatic circumstances. This is a rare significance of the term πράγματα (in the plural); a comparable, though not identical, case, is Ar. Ra. 959 (the speaker is Euripides) οἰκεῖα πράγματ' εἰσάγων (staging everyday scenes).

8b ἀνατριαινώσει The verb ἀνατριαινόω is a hapax. It is compound from the preposition ἀνά plus τρίαινα (trident), meaning to shake/ turn upside down (as if) with a trident. The preposition ἀνά in composition can add the notion of upheaval; cf. Anaxandr. fr. 3.3 (ἀνακεχαίτικεν: to have overthrown). The second compound, τρίαινα, is the trademark of Poseidon (cf. Ar. Eq. 839–840 with van Leeuwen 1900: 153; Ar. Pax 570 with Olson 1998: 193). Given Poseidon's association with earthquakes, the verb may entail a strong metaphor, i. e. this new invention will have the effect of an earthquake, bringing down the house with tumultuous applause and cheers. The connection of this ad hoc coinage with Poseidon strengthens the hypothesis presented above about identifying speaker B with Poseidon. There is another compound verb with τρίαινα as its second component; this is συντριαινόω: shatter (as if) with a trident. It occurs once in Euripides[12] (HF 946: … Κυκλώπων βάθρα / … / στρεπτῷ σιδήρῳ συντριαινῶσαι: … to pry up with twisted iron the Cyclopean foundations) and once in Comedy, Pl.Com. fr. 23: … εἰ μὲν σὺ τὴν θάλασσαν ἀποδώσεις ταύτην ἑκών· / εἰ δὲ μή, <'γώ> ταῦτα πάντα συντριαινῶν ἀπολέσω (if you don't return the sea back to me, I'll shatter and ruin everything with the trident), where Meineke (1,170) identifies – with reason – Poseidon as the speaker. Plato's fragment is a useful parallel that reinforces the possibility of Poseidon being the addressee of ἀνατριαινώσει in Amphis' fragment. That is, speaker A (probably Dionysus), addressing his ignorant collocutor (speaker B), tries to be intelligible by speaking the language with which speaker B (possibly Poseidon) is familiar and which, therefore, he will easily understand. Thus, speaker B appears as a fairly naïve and unlearned character, who needs to be carefully taught about this new device. This portrayal finds an interesting parallel with Poseidon's presentation by Lucian in both Dialogues of the Sea-Gods and Dialogues of the Gods. Lucian presents Poseidon asking questions, as if he were either ignorant of the current divine affairs or slightly naïve. Such an impression is conveyed by most Lucian's dialogues, in which Poseidon is a speaking character (e. g. DDeor. 12, DMar. 3, 8, etc.).

8c κρότοις Here the term κρότος signifies the clapping of hands as applause, but also perhaps to keep the rhythm of song; see e. g. Ar. Ra. 157 κρότον χειρῶν πολύν (great clapping of hands; cf. Dover 1993: 210), D.C. Hist. Rom. 54.27.1 κρότοις καὶ ἐπαίνοις αὐτὸν ἐτίμησαν (they honored him with applause and praises), Hld. 10.41.3 σὺν εὐφημίαις καὶ κρότοις (with acclamations and applause), etc. The term can rarely denote disapproval as well; e.g. Pl. La. 184a (γέλως καὶ κρότος, laughter and [mocking] clapping). For further meanings cf. LSJ[9] s.v.

---

[12] In E. Ba. 1103 Diggle suggested the reading συντριαινοῦσαι against συγκεραυνοῦσαι preserved by the manuscript tradition. Seaford (2001: 237) explains why the original ms. reading should be kept in text.

fr. 15 (15 K.)

τί φῄς; σὺ ταυτὶ προσδοκᾷς πείσειν ἐμέ, ὡς ἔστ' ἐραστὴς ὅστις ὡραῖον φιλῶν τρόπων ἐραστής ἐστι, τὴν ὄψιν παρεὶς σώφρων τ' ἀληθῶς; οὔτε τοῦτο πείθομαι 5 οὔθ' ὡς πένης ἄνθρωπος ἐνοχλῶν πολλάκις τοῖς εὐποροῦσιν οὐ λαβεῖν τι βούλεται

2 ὡραῖον φιλῶν Jacobs: ὡραίων φίλων ACE: ὡραίαν φιλῶν Nauck Mél. Gr.-R. 2 (1866) 429: ὡραίων φίλου Mus.: ὡραίου φίλου Blaydes Adv. ii.40 4 σώφρων τ' ἀληθῶς; Dobree: ἄφρων τ' ἀληθῶς A: om. CE

What are you talking about? Do you expect to persuade me of this very thing, that there is any lover, who, loving a youth in the prime of life, is in love with his character, disregarding his appearance, and is truly temperate? I am persuaded neither of this 5 nor that a poor man, who often gives trouble to the wealthy ones, does not want to receive something

Ath. 13.563c
περὶ δὲ τοῦ ἐρᾶν Ἄμφις ἐν Διθυράμβῳ (ἐν Διθ. om. CE) φησίν· τί — βούλεται

And regarding the subject of being in love, Amphis says in "The Dithyramb": "What — something"

Metre Iambic trimeter

1. ⏑–⏑– –|–⏑– ––⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
2. – –⏑– –|–⏑– ––⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
3. ⏑–⏑– –|–⏑– ––⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
4. ––⏑– –|–⏑– ⏑–⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)

5. ––⏑– ––⏑|⏑⏑ ––⏑– (hephthemimeral caesura)
6. ––⏑– ⏑|–⏑– ⏑–⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)

Discussion Meineke 3,307; Bothe 482f.; Kock 2,240; Edmonds 2,318f.; PCG 2,220; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 298; Papachrysostomou 62–65

Citation Context The present fragment is one of many passages (comic and other) cited within a general discussion on the subjects of love and beauty (περὶ τοῦ ἔρωτος καὶ περὶ κάλλους), instigated among the banqueters at Ath. 13.561a. These passages explore the nature of Love (Ἔρως) and the mentality of lovers (ἐρῶντες / ἐρασταί); additionally, some of them (like Amphis' present fragment) vehemently challenge and question certain widespread assumptions relating to these issues.

Constitution of Text The Epitome codices C and E leave out the play's title (cf. Arnott 2000 and Intro. 3 "Tradition & Reception"). In l. 2 Kassel & Austin adopt Jacobs' conjecture ὡραῖον φιλῶν (1809: 297) which is the most plausible reading in context. Its advantages over the rest of the readings are: (i) the presence of a participle (φιλῶν) that here is syntactically easier and less clumsy (than a noun); and (ii) the singular number ("X loves Y" that implies a typical case or an example). Jacobs' conjecture receives further support from the parallel structure of E. Tr. 1051 (οὐκ ἔστ' ἐραστὴς ὅστις οὐκ ἀεὶ φιλεῖ) and Alex. fr. 70.1–2 (ὡς ὅστις αὐτῆς τῆς ἀκμῆς τῶν σωμάτων / ἐρᾷ). In l. 4 the point of the speaker's outburst rests precisely on choosing Dobree's suggestion σώφρων over ἄφρων, preserved by codex A. That is, the speaker cannot accept that there can ever exist a truly self-controlled lover who can be in love only with one's character disregarding physical beauty. Codices C and E omit this part of the text altogether.

Interpretation Thematically, the present fragment touches on the vast, multi-dimensional, and much debated topic of ancient Greek homosexuality; see Dover (1978), Cohen (1991) 171–202, Davidson (2007) passim. The speaker fervently argues against the existence of an exclusively spiritual love, devoid of any sensual desire and any interest in physical beauty. The background against which such an argument should be interpreted is the renewed and vigorous interest in Eros, attested in both literature and arts during the fourth century BC. An increased interest in the nature of Eros was demonstrated by the majority of philosophical schools, and this resulted in an unprecedented proliferation of treatises bearing titles such as Περὶ ἔρωτος, Ἐρωτικοί, and Ἐρωτικαὶ τέχναι; e.g. both Euclides (Socrates' student) and Theophrastus wrote an Ἐρωτικός. Plato's treatment of Eros (mainly in Symposion and Phaedrus) and his (often misinterpreted) theory of love as spiritual friendship in a common pursuit of higher truth is just one of many manifestations of this widespread trend. For further discussion of the representation of Eros in Plato and generally in fourth-century philosophy see Halperin (1990); Gould (1963) 18–79; the entire part II (pp. 91–157) of the 2013 volume on Eros edited by Sanders et. al. (comprising chapters by Thumiger, Renaut, Rosen, Leontsini, and Gill), plus Cairns' chapter in the same volume (pp. 233–250). During the fourth century BC Eros also features as the dominant figure in the arts, expelling even Aphrodite at times; cf. Rohde ([5]1974) 59–62 and Metzger (1951) 41–58. Accordingly, several playwrights of Middle Comedy reflect upon the nature of Eros and discuss the mentality of those in love (just like Amphis does); e.g. Antiph. fr. 101, Aristopho fr. 11, Bato fr. 7, Eub. fr. 40, Theophil. fr. 12, Alex. frr. 20, 70, 290. Eros even features in the following play-titles: Antiphanes' Ἀντερῶσα and Δυσέρωτες, Anaxandrides' Ἀντέρως, and Nicostratus' Ἀντερῶσα.

The present fragment forms part of a dialogue between two comic characters, probably within the context of an ongoing agon (note especially the presence of the verb πείθω, l. 1, cf. comm. ad loc.). The speaker takes the floor the moment our fragment begins (cf. comm. on τί φῄς;), as a response to what his collocutor has just said. His abrupt style reveals his surprise, irritation, and categorical disagreement with his collocutor's opinion.

1a τί φῄς; This exclamatory question is a stereotypical way of expressing utmost surprise, shock, and disbelief, usually combined with a certain degree of irritation, upon listening to a preposterous / unbelievable piece of information; e.g. Ar. Eq. 1345, Nu. 1443b, Pax 872b, Av. 301b and 414 (cf. Dunbar 1995: 295–296); Antiph. fr. 69.12; Philem. fr. 45.4; E. Med. 691; Plu. 78a.

1b ταυτί Nominative plural, neuter gender, of the demonstrative pronoun οὗτος, strengthened (as usual in Attic dialect) by the demonstrative -ί (always long: -ῑ). The extra emphasis desired by the speaker and generated by -ί is often (as here) a sign of intense or otherwise disturbed emotional status; e.g. Cratin. fr. 351; Ar. Ach. 167, Eq. 461, Nu. 184, Av. 801.

1c πείσειν The rhetorical element is a quintessential ingredient of the comic genre; see Harding (1994) and Papageorgiou (2000). The notion of (successful or failed) persuasion to a character's arguments occurs repeatedly throughout Comedy, either inside or outside the formal context of an agon; see e.g. the agon in Aristophanes' Clouds 889–1114 between the Better and the Worse Argument (cf. Dover 1968: lvii-lxvi, 209–230) and the agon in Frogs 830–1481 between Aeschylus and Euripides (cf. Dover 1993: 7–22); cf. Ar. Ach. 626 (cf. Olson 2002: 235), V. 115–117, Th. 1170, etc.

1d σὺ … ἐμέ The two personal pronouns are carefully positioned at the beginning and the end of the clause, so that a major antithesis is emphatically drawn between them. This antithesis suggests that the two individuals (the speaker and his collocutor) are diametrically different from a certain point of view; e. g. social / political rank, free or slave status, etc. See e. g. how Lamachus confronts Dicaeopolis with quasi-similar language in Ar. Ach. 593 ταυτὶ λέγεις σὺ τὸν στρατηγὸν πτωχὸς ὤν ("do you, a beggar, say this to a general?"). Cf. Ar. Th. 918.

2a ἐραστής The noun ἐραστής derives from the verb ἐράω / ἔραμαι (love, desire passionately; cf. LSJ[9] s. vv.). Accordingly, ἐραστής designates (i) the lover of a boy / man (Ar. V. 1025) or a woman (Ar. Ec. 994; Apollod.Car. fr. 8), with explicit sexual reference (Ar. Nu. 979, Alex. fr. 244), though not always with a clear indication that the sexual desire is actually consummated (Ar. Nu. 976); and (ii) the passionate admirer / staunch supporter of someone (Ar. Ach. 143, Eq. 732; Pl. Alc. 1 132a δημεραστής; cf. Connor 1971: 96–136) or something (Ar. V. 474 μοναρχίας ἐραστά: zealous supporter of monarchy); i. e. in case (ii) the admiration is so intense and overwhelming that assimilates to and borders with erotic / sexual desire. Cf. Pericles' much celebrated allegorical concept of Athenian citizens being ἐρασταί of the city of Athens (Th. 2.43.1); see Monoson (2000) 64–87.

The term ἐραστής and its cognate ἔρως are only two of the many terms used in ancient Greek language to designate love in its multiple manifestations and ramifications. In his book The Greeks and Greek love: A radical reappraisal of homosexuality in ancient Greece (London 2007) Davidson explores the manifold versions and ramifications of "Love" in the broadest sense and concludes Part I.2 with these words (p. 67):

> "Agapē therefore is 'fondness'. Pothos is 'longing'. Himeros is a 'love attack'. Philia is 'intimate love'. Erōs is 'driving love'. An erastēs is 'one possessed by such love', an erōmenos 'the object of such love'. … Erōs can be defined … [as] more outgoing than intimate love, more internal than a love attack, more energetic than longing, more passionate than fondness, less sexual than lust, and it is answered by gracious favouring, armed with which erōs stands out starkly against the dark encroaching field of mercenary promiscuity."

2b ὡς ἔστ' ἐραστὴς ὅστις ὡραῖον φιλῶν This line (regardless of Jacobs' conjecture) is structurally (though not notionally) parallel to E. Tr. 1051 οὐκ ἔστ' ἐραστὴς ὅστις οὐκ ἀεὶ φιλεῖ (he who does not love forever is not a lover). Both lines scan as iambic trimeters and feature parechesis of the letter complex -στ-.

The adjective ὡραῖος (< ὥρα) denotes anything that is at its prime, seasonable, timely; cf. LSJ[9] s. v. It often describes a young person (boy or girl) at puberty, i. e. an age when one reaches the point of prime sexual attractiveness and can become sexually active; e. g. Ar. Ach. 1148 (cf. Olson 2002: 347), Av.

138, Ec. 696; Anaxandr. fr. 34.12, Metag. fr. 4.2 (cf. Orth 2014: 402–403), Mnesim. fr. 4.5, Men. Kol. fr. 4; Aeschin. 1.42, etc. The adjective ὡραῖος can also have a non-human referent; e. g. fish (Alex. fr. 191.5; cf. Arnott 1996: 561), fruit (Hdt. 1.202, Praxilla 747.3 PMG), etc. See further Olson & Sens (2000) 167–168 (comm. on Archestr. fr. 39.9–10).

3 τρόπων ἐραστής The term τρόπος / τρόποι signifies a man's ways, habits, character (cf. LSJ[9] s. v. τρόπος III) and specifically designates each human being's very own nature, i. e. one's distinctive mental and behavioural pattern, a person's unique personality. Being attracted only by a person's τρόποι seems absurd and hypocritical to the speaker of this fragment. Similar disbelief is expressed in Bato fr. 4.3–4, where the speaker states his indignation at the hypocrisy of those pretending to fall in love with someone's character: μάλιστ' ἐμοὶ δήπουθε κινοῦσιν χολὴν / οἱ τῶν τρόπων φάσκοντες ἐπιεικῶς ἐρᾶν (above all they mostly make me sick those who claim to be fair lovers of manners). Such (almost hostile) attitude on Comedy's behalf is to be interpreted as a response to contemporary phenomena – in both literature and real life. The target seems to be the widespread hypocrisy that was being fueled – among others – by Plato's idiosyncratic treatment of Eros (cf. "Interpretation" above). In certain Platonic passages character values are rated more highly than external beauty; cf. e. g. Smp. 182d: κάλλιον τὸ φανερῶς ἐρᾶν τοῦ λάθρᾳ, καὶ μάλιστα τῶν γενναιοτάτων καὶ ἀρίστων, κἂν αἰσχίους ἄλλων ὦσι (it is more honourable to love openly than in secret, especially when the beloved excels not so much in beauty as in nobility and virtue); Smp. 183d: πονηρὸς δ' ἐστὶν ἐκεῖνος ὁ ἐραστὴς ὁ πάνδημος, ὁ τοῦ σώματος μᾶλλον ἢ τῆς ψυχῆς ἐρῶν· καὶ γὰρ οὐδὲ μόνιμός ἐστιν, ἅτε οὐ μονίμου ἐρῶν πράγματος (by "wicked" we mean that popular lover, who craves the body rather than the soul; as he is not in love with what abides, he himself is not abiding); Lg. 837b-c: ὁ μὲν γὰρ τοῦ σώματος ἐρῶν, καὶ τῆς ὥρας καθάπερ ὀπώρας πεινῶν, ἐμπλησθῆναι παρακελεύεται ἑαυτῷ, τιμὴν οὐδεμίαν ἀπονέμων τῷ τῆς ψυχῆς ἤθει τοῦ ἐρωμένου· ὁ δὲ πάρεργον μὲν τὴν τοῦ σώματος ἐπιθυμίαν ἔχων, ὁρῶν δὲ μᾶλλον ἢ ἐρῶν, τῇ ψυχῇ δὲ ὄντως τῆς ψυχῆς ἐπιτεθυμηκώς, ὕβριν ἥγηται τὴν περὶ τὸ σῶμα τοῦ σώματος πλησμονήν, τὸ σῶφρον δὲ καὶ ἀνδρεῖον καὶ μεγαλοπρεπὲς καὶ τὸ φρόνιμον αἰδούμενος ἅμα καὶ σεβόμενος, ἁγνεύειν ἀεὶ μεθ' ἁγνεύοντος τοῦ ἐρωμένου βούλοιτ' ἄν (for he that is in love with the body and hungering after its bloom, as it were that of a ripening peach, urges himself on to take his fill of it, paying no respect to the disposition of the beloved; whereas he that counts bodily desire as but secondary, and puts longing looks in place of love, with soul lusting really for soul, regards the bodily satisfaction of the body as an outrage, and, reverently worshipping temperance, courage, nobility and wisdom, will desire to live always chastely in company with the chaste object of his love). Comparable notions are also found in Xenophon, Smp. 8.22: ἐξ ὧν οὐδὲν θαυμαστὸν εἰ καὶ τὸ ὑπερορᾶν ἐγγίγνεται αὐτῷ τοῦ ἐραστοῦ. καὶ σκοπῶν δ' ἄν τις εὕροι ἐκ μὲν τῶν διὰ τοὺς τρόπους φιλουμένων οὐδὲν χαλεπὸν γεγενημένον, ἐκ δὲ τῆς ἀναιδοῦς ὁμιλίας πολλὰ ἤδη καὶ ἀνόσια πεπραγμένα (consequently, it need not excite any surprise if contempt for the lover is engendered in him. If one looked into the matter, also, he would descry no ill effect when people are loved for their personality, but that many shocking results have come from companionship lost to shame). See further Dover (1978) 60–68, 81–91.

4a σώφρων Apart from the generic meaning of sound mind, the adjective σώφρων can have a distinctively moral sense, i. e. having control over the sensual desires, temperate, chaste (cf. LSJ[9] s. v. II). It is with this particular sense that it is used by Amphis in the present fragment; and, in correlation with τρόπων ἐραστής, the adjective σώφρων refers to resistance to the physical allure of the boy. Likewise, in Aristophanes both σώφρων and σωφροσύνη often have moral (and/or political) connotations; e. g. Nu. 529, 1006; Av. 1540 (cf. Dunbar 1995: 706), etc. Noteworthy is Neil's remark (1901: 204) that, when politically coloured in Greek literature, the terms "σώφρων and σωφροσύνη were naturally used of constitutions which resisted extreme democracy". See further North (1966) 97–100, Dover (1974) 57.

4b ἀληθῶς Truly, actually, in reality; this adverb is purposely used by the speaker to emphasise his point and to raise the question between semblance/hypocrisy and reality; i. e. "is there someone who can be truly self-controlled and pay no attention to physical beauty?"

5–6 In order to clarify his point and highlight the incredibility/implausibility of the subject under discussion, the speaker draws an analogy between a poor man and a lover: a pauper pestering the wealthy for something other than money is equally absurd to a lover being in love solely with a person's character regardless of his appearance. This analogy is worth of some attention, since it can be linked with Plato's Symposion, and in particular with what Socrates says about Love being the son of Poverty, and sleeping on doorsteps (203c-d): Πόρου καὶ Πενίας υἱὸς ὢν ὁ Ἔρως ἐν τοιαύτῃ τύχῃ καθέστηκε. πρῶτον μὲν πένης ἀεί ἐστι … ἐπὶ θύραις καὶ ἐν ὁδοῖς ὑπαίθριος κοιμώμενος … ἀεὶ ἐνδείᾳ σύνοικος (as the son of Resource and Poverty, Love finds himself in the following situation; first, he is ever poor … takes his rest on doorsteps and waysides in the open air … and he ever dwells with want). This small piece of intertextual evidence may be used in favour of linking the fragment directly to Plato and to his overall treatment of Eros in his writings.

5 ἐνοχλῶν The verb ἐνοχλέω is most aptly chosen here, since it occasionally bears sexual connotations (pester, harass); thus, it helps draw the two parallels together, i. e. the lover and the pauper. For erotic overtones in the usage of ἐνοχλέω cf. Pl. Alc. 1 104d: τί ποτε βούλει καὶ εἰς τίνα ἐλπίδα βλέπων ἐνοχλεῖς με, ἀεὶ ὅπου ἂν ὦ ἐπιμελέστατα παρών (Alcibiades addressing Socrates: what is your aim and expectation in bothering me by making a particular point of always turning up wherever I may be); Luc. DDeor. 10.5: ἐνοχλήσω γάρ σε συνεχῶς στρεφόμενος. —Τοῦτ' αὐτό μοι τὸ ἥδιστον ποιήσεις, εἰ ἀγρυπνήσαιμι μετὰ σοῦ φιλῶν πολλάκις καὶ περιπτύσσων (dialogue between Ganymedes and Zeus: For I'll be an awful nuisance to you, tossing and turning all night long. – That's just what I'll like best; staying awake with you, kissing and hugging you again and again); DMeretr. 4.2: πόσα οἴει ἐπὶ τούτῳ μεμηχανῆσθαί με περιλαμβάνουσαν, ἐπιστρέφουσαν, φιλοῦσαν ἀπεστραμμένου το μετάφρενον; ὁ δ' οὐδ' ὁπωστιοῦν ὑπεμαλάχθη, ἀλλ' εἴ μοι, φησίν, ἐπὶ πλέον ἐνοχλήσεις, ἄπειμι ἤδη (You can imagine all the tricks I tried in this situation. I tried to hug him and to turn him to me, and kissed his back, though he kept turned away from me. He didn't soften a bit, but said, "If you bother me any more, I'll leave this instant, even though it is midnight"); Aeschin. 1.135: ἐν τοῖς γυμνασίοις ὀχληρός ὢν καὶ πλείστων ἐραστὴς γεγονώς (after having made a nuisance of myself in the gymnasia and having been the lover of many).

Ἑπτὰ ἐπὶ Θήβας (Hepta epi Thēbas)
("Seven against Thebes")

Discussion Edmonds 2,318–321; PCG 2,220; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 298

Title The title suggests a mythological theme. Apart from Aeschylus' homonymous tragic play (produced in 467 BC), Alexis also wrote a Seven against Thebes (PCG 2,64); this is one of the nine shared play-titles between Amphis and Alexis (cf. Intro. 8). The possibility of comic burlesque (of indefinable extent) deriding Aeschylus' tragic prototype naturally presents itself; cf. Intro. 4 ("Themes & Motifs"). By way of alternative, Edmonds (2,318–321) suggests a topical connection of the title (and the play) with contemporary historic events, and particularly with the restoration of democracy in Thebes in 379 BC (led by a group of seven exiles, cf. X. HG 5.4); accordingly, he dates Amphis' play immediately after these events, in 378 BC.

What is especially perplexing regarding the play's title is the dative case Θήβαις (instead of the accusative Θήβας), which is transmitted by Athenaeus' – largely reliable – codex Marcianus (cf. Intro. 3 "Tradition & Reception") in both passages, 7.294a and 295e, where Alexis' and Amphis' play are respectively introduced in Athenaeus' text. The manuscript tradition relating to Aeschylus' tragic play is not unanimous on this issue either (dative or accusative). Although the overwhelming majority of relevant sources preserve the reading Θήβας in accusative (e. g. Ath. 1.22a (Epitome mss.), Ar. Ra. 1021), there are certain sporadic instances of the dative (Θήβαις), the most intriguing of which is probably the Oxyrhynchus papyrus 2256 fr. 2 that preserves the accusative before correction and the dative after correction. See further Hutchinson (1985) xvii. Arnott (1996: 221) attempts to reconcile the two trends by noting how the vertical tail of α can be misread for αι in early minuscule, and then suggests an altogether different interpretation of how Amphis and Alexis could be burlesquing not Aeschylus' tragedy but a recently produced homonymous tragic play, which in a twist of originality, featured the dative Θήβαις in its title (1996: 222).

fr. 16 (16 K.)

γλαῦκοι δ' ὅλοι, ῥαχιστὰ κρανίων μέρη, εὔσαρκα

1 post μέρη interpunxi ipsa

And entire glaukoi, heads split in halves, meaty

Ath. 7.295e-f
Ἄμφις ἐν Ἑπτὰ ἐπὶ Θήβαις· γλαῦκοι — εὔσαρκα

Amphis in "Seven Against Thebes": "And — meaty"

Metre Iambic trimeter

1. ——⏑— ⏑—⏑|—— ⏑—⏑— (hephthemimeral caesura)
2. ——⏑

Discussion Meineke 3,307; Bothe 483; Kock 2,240; Edmonds 320f.; PCG 2,220f.; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 298f.

Citation Context The present fragment forms part of a series of passages cited by Athenaeus for featuring glaukos (γλαῦκος), i. e. a particular species of fish of greyish colour, within a wider discussion of various kinds of fish and seafood. This erudite discussion begins at 7.277c, where Athenaeus – as external narrator – promises to Timocrates to relate everything that the banqueters said about fish. For the greater part of the narration, fish names are mentioned in quasi-alphabetical order (as promised by Athenaeus in the same passage: κατὰ στοιχεῖον τάξω τὰ ὀνόματα). After a long digression on (braggart) cooks at 7.288c, the discussion about fish and seafood resumes at 7.293f. The present fragment is immediately followed by another fragment by Amphis (fr. 35), where the diminutive γλαυκινίδιον occurs (cf. comm. ad loc.).

Constitution of Text I inserted a comma after μέρη, since I believe that the adjective εὔσαρκα does not refer to μέρη, but to a different noun that followed in the text and is now lost. By definition, a head (of either an animal or fish; cf. comm. s. v. κρανίων) cannot be fleshy (εὔσαρκον); the amount of meat present in a skull is minimal and, in any case, not enough to justify this characterisation (cf. further comm. s. v. εὔσαρκα below).

Interpretation The fragment is a miniature example of a comic topos: the foodlist. Food itself is part and parcel of comic discourse throughout Greek Comedy (see Wilkins 2000, Gilula 1995b) and the foodlist is one of Comedy's most widespread motifs (cf. comm. on Amphis fr. 9.3–4). The foodlist typically consists of (syndetic or asyndetic) enumeration of individual foodstuffs and generates a feeling of abundance and plenty. Although prevalent during especially Middle (and New) Comedy, the origin of food catalogues is traced in Old Comedy, e. g. Hermipp. fr. 63 (cf. Gilula 2000). Among the most outstanding (and lengthy) examples are Anaxandr. fr. 42, Mnesim. fr. 4 (cf. Gilula 1995a, Papachrysostomou 2008: 186–210), and Ephipp. fr. 12. See Arnott (1996) 224–225. In all cases the context is demonstrably sympotic and refers to an off-stage feast, whether a preparation for or an account of one, since food in Comedy is always mentioned – and occasionally seen – but never consumed on stage (cf. Amphis fr. 9 "Interpretation"). The surviving fragments from Archestratus' Hedypatheia, written in early fourth century, reveal that the poem was a major example of the food-catalogue pattern outside Comedy; see Olson & Sens (2000) xxi, xxiv-xxviii.

A glimpse from a bountiful (if not lavish) feast is what the present fragment offers us. Fish and meat are said to be available and already served (cf. ῥαχιστά), so the dinner must already be underway, while someone describes to a third person or informs the audience of what is happening off-stage.

Regarding the speaker's identity, this must be someone who is well-versed in (if not a guru of) food. In all probability, this is a professional cook (who cooked the food he describes), or else his knowledgeable assistant, judging by his fairly idiosyncratic language (he coins a hapax (ῥαχιστά) and uses another term (εὔσαρκα) in an original way; cf. comm. s. vv.), and also by the fact that he analytically describes both food and its serving. Similarly affected language and pretentious passion for linguistic precision are stereotypical traits of professional and braggart cooks in Comedy, especially during the periods of Middle and New.

In real life professional cooks were freemen (see Rankin 1907: 21, against Athenaeus' claim at 14.658f), who were hired on special occasions (whether a private occasion, e. g. Posidipp. fr. 1, or a public festivity, e. g. Ath. 4.172f on sacred rites at Delos); yet, there were also other cooks, of servile status, who were permanently attached to a household (cf. Berthiaume 1982: 74–76). One of the cooks' tasks was to preside over sacrifices; accordingly, their role grew to be considered quasi-sacred (on the procedure followed at sacrificial feasts see Blake 1966: 171–174 and Berthiaume 1982: 17–43). This may explain in part the pompous nature of cooks in Comedy, where they appear early on (they can even be traced back to Doric farce; cf. Berthiaume 1982: 74). The preliminary stage of the cook as a comic character is discerned already in Aristophanes, who constitutes a groundbreaking ancestor for the later literary evolution of the figure (cf. e. g. Pax 922–1126 and Av. 848–1057). During the periods of Middle and New Comedy the cook figure becomes stereotyped as a boastful and arrogant character (e. g. Dionys.Com. fr. 2, Mnesim. fr. 4, Alex. fr. 177, Posidipp. fr. 28; Men. Dysc. 646), prone to stealing (e. g. Dionys.Com. fr. 3, Euphro fr. 1), who typically employs grandiloquent language and sounds self-conceited. See further Dohm (1964) 30–55, 67–275; Nesselrath (1990) 297–309; Dalby (1995) 121–124; Arnott (1996) 116; Wilkins (2000) 87, 387–410; Dobrov 2002; Papachrysostomou (2008) 155–182, 186–210. Cf. Amphis fr. 39 "Interpretation".

The presence of fish in the plural (γλαῦκοι) in this fragment suffices to elevate the narrated dinner to an elite status, since fish was highly esteemed in contemporary Athenian society and was considered to be the luxury food par excellence (cf. Wilkins 2000: 293–304). Ostentatious consumption of (expensive and large) fish was widely considered an arrogant exhibition of wealth and power by the elite, a reversal of democratic equality, and even an indication of tyrannical propensities; cf. Davidson 1993. See further Amphis fr. 26 (comm. s. v. ὄψον) and Amphis fr. 30 "Interpretation".

1a γλαῦκοι The appellation γλαῦκος is a frequently mentioned fish-name in ancient texts, used to designate two (at least) quite different species of edible grey-coloured fish; further, precise identification is not possible. The one γλαῦκος-species is a viviparous fish that belongs to either the shark or the dogfish family. The second γλαῦκος-species is a much smaller fish, probably from the horse-mackerel family. See further Strömberg (1943) 23, Thompson (1947) 48, Arnott (1996) 318 (he suggests instead that the second γλαῦκος is a species of corb), Olson & Sens (2000) 94. Glaukos is commonly mentioned as a delicacy; e. g. Alex. fr. 115.8, Anaxandr. fr. 31, Anaxipp. fr. 1.40, Axion. fr. 4.4, Cratin. fr. 336, Archestr. fr. 21; also, in various diminutive forms: γλαυκίσκος (Arched. fr. 3, Bato fr. 5.16, Damox. fr. 2.18), γλαυκινίδιον (Amphis fr. 35; a hapax), and γλαυκίδιον (Antiph. fr. 221).

1b ὅλοι This is a predicative adjective that defines γλαῦκοι and emphasises the abundance of available food and, consequently, the lavishness of the dinner; i. e. fish is not served cut up into small pieces or as individual portions, but in whole – a token of the host's generosity in itself. Through this expression the speaker achieves a more vivid and graphic description of food and assists the audience's/collocutor's imagination to virtually reproduce what is unseen on stage.

Fish served in whole is also emphatically described in a similar way in Mnesim. fr. 4.33 φοξῖνος ὅλος, κορακῖνος ὅλος (a whole minnow, a whole crow-fish). Whole oxen are also said to be served in Ar. Ach. 85–86 (ὅλους / βοῦς) and Ra. 506, while in Diph. fr. 90 we read of an entire sheep (ὁλοσχερῆ ἄρνα) and of whole piglets (χοιρίδια ὅλα) being served up; along with a sense of extravagance and / or preposterousness. See further Olson (2002) 99.

1c ῥαχιστά This is a hapax adjective that Amphis coined from the verb ῥαχίζω, which means cut through the spine, cleave in twain (LSJ[9] s. v. I); e. g. A. Pers. 426 (cf. Blomfield 1818: 151–152), S. Aj. 56, 299. Accordingly, the adjective ῥαχιστός means cleft, split, divided into two. In the present fragment ῥαχιστά refers to κρανίων μέρη, so the entire expression (ῥαχιστὰ κρανίων μέρη) is meant to designate (animal) heads that are cut in halves, dissected precisely in the middle, as if one were to follow the spine upwards and divide the head in two starting from the spine's base. The fact that the heads are already cut suggests that food has been served and the dinner is underway (rather than still being in the preparatory stage). In modern terms, one might speak of a serving suggestion; and this is a fairly anatomical one indeed. So this is a speaker who knows how to serve heads on dinner table and also how to anatomically describe the incision performed to the point that – in his search for accuracy – he even coins a new graphic adjective; this twofold dexterity strengthens the hypothesis of him being a professional cook (cf. "Interpretation").

There is a further comic instance, Eub. fr. 14.4, where we come across another germane hapax variation, i. e. διερράχισται (<διαρραχίζω): διερράχισται σεμνὰ δελφάκων κρέα (the sacred meat of pigs has been carved up). Opposite tragedy's solemn usage of ῥαχίζω (to denote fierce killing of people and animals; cf. aforementioned passages), Amphis and Eubulus come up with two hapax variations of the same verb, which they playfully apply to sympotic context. This may be regarded as a case of linguistic comic burlesque – albeit on a limited scale.

1d κρανίων The term κρανίον is used to designate (apart from the human head) the head of both animals and fish; e. g. Ar. fr. 380 (κρανίον λάβρακος: sea-bass head), Alex. fr. 103.24 (αἰγῶν κρανία: goats' heads), Antiph. fr. 45 (κρανίον σινόδοντος: sea-bream head). In the present fragment the referent is not clarified; fish precedes (γλαῦκοι) and meat follows (εὔσαρκα; cf. comm. s. v.). In theory, the meaning in the present fragment might be argued both ways; however, the meaning of ῥαχιστά (cut up in halves, split at the spine's base; cf. comm. s. v.) leaves little room for the subject being a fish, since dissecting a fish head in the middle would (a) probably ruin the head, and (b) make no sense as a dinner course. Besides, fish heads, when mentioned as a delicacy, are always described as being whole; cf. the aforementioned Ar. fr. 380 and Antiph. fr. 45, and also Amphis fr. 35 (γλαυκινιδίου κεφάλαια), Antiph. fr. 130.4 (γόγγρου κεφαλή: head of a conger eel), Callias fr. 6 (θύννου κεφάλαιον: tuna head), etc.

2 εὔσαρκα Fleshy, in good condition, meaty (cf. LSJ[9] s. v.). The linguistic originality of l. 1 continues (cf. comm. s. v. ῥαχιστά); this is the only occurrence of εὔσαρκος in Comedy. This adjective commonly occurs in medical texts; but even in non-medical texts and authors, εὔσαρκος refers to the physique of a human being or a living animal – never to the juicy appearance of cooked meat served on table. However, given (i) the affected use of language in l. 1 (cf. ῥαχιστά) and (ii) the sympotic/dinner context of the fragment, we can reasonably interpret εὔσαρκα as referring to fleshy/juicy meat portions, cooked and served on a table. And, provided that neither εὔσαρκος nor σάρξ (flesh) are anywhere associated with fish in Greek literature, it is safe to assume that εὔσαρκα refers to some kind of meat. Additionally, as already mentioned (cf. "Constitution of Text"), I believe that εὔσαρκα refers to a noun that followed in the text that is now lost, and not to κρανίων μέρη that precedes; and this is for two reasons: (a) the phrase κρανίων μέρη is already and sufficiently defined by an adjective (ῥαχιστά), and (b) most importantly, an animal's head cannot possibly contain that much meat in it to the extent that it could ever justify the characterisation meaty/juicy.

Ἔριθοι (Erithoi)
("The Day-Labourers")

Discussion Meineke 1,406; Bothe 483; Kock 2,241; Edmonds 2,320f.; PCG 2,221f.; Papachrysostomou 65–66

Title This is one of Amphis' banausic play-titles and one of his shared titles with Alexis (Παννυχίς ἢ Ἔριθοι, PCG 2,121–125; cf. Intro. 8). The noun ἔριθος – of either male or female gender – signifies the day-labourer, the worker who is hired per day (cf. LSJ[9] s. v.). The term occurs already in the Homeric poems, where it denotes (male) mowers (Il. 18.550) and (male) reapers (Il. 18.560). By Amphis' time a shift in the term's meaning and gender seems to have occurred, since ἔριθοι is predominantly used for female weavers/ workers in wool (cf. common connection with ἔριον: wool), hired by individuals or the state, of slave, metic or free status – although manual work was naturally considered rather undignified for women of free civic birth; see Sud. ε 2990; Phot. ε 1913; D. 57.45: πολλαὶ καὶ τιτθαὶ καὶ ἔριθοι καὶ τρυγήτριαι γεγόνασ' ὑπὸ τῶν τῆς πόλεως κατ' ἐκείνους τοὺς χρόνους συμφορῶν ἀσταὶ γυναῖκες (many women have become nurses and labourers at the loom or in the vineyards owing to the misfortunes of the city in those days, women of civic birth as well); Theoc. 15.78–80: τὰ ποικίλα πρᾶτον ἄθρησον,/λεπτὰ καὶ ὡς χαρίεντα …/πότνι' Ἀθαναία, ποῖαί σφ' ἐπόνασαν ἔριθοι (first of all, look at the tapestries, how finely woven and elegant they are … lady Athena, what skilled women weavers they must have been to make them); P.Hibeh 1.121.34 (third century BC): ἐρίων ἔριθοι (weavers of wool). For a thorough survey of the wool-working process see Blümner ([2]1912) 98–189.

It is remarkable that the title is in the plural; yet, it cannot be determined whether these figures constituted the play's chorus or were simply a pair or a small group of workers; on the chorus in Middle Comedy see Maidment 1935, Webster ([2]1970) 58–63, Hunter 1979 and (1983) 191, Rothwell 1995. Still, it is not so much the number as the gender of the title's characters that is crucial for interpreting the play as a whole. Arnott (1996: 515–516) considers a number of possibilities about the role of ἔριθοι within Alexis' play (the chorus, a group of minor people, a pair of women involved in the plot), suggesting (though not explicitly stating) that these figures were female. The only obstacle that keeps us from understanding Amphis' Ἔριθοι as female workers is the masculine article τούς, preserved by Athenaeus' codex A (cf. Intro. 3 "Tradition & Reception"), as an introduction to Amphis fr. 18 (from the same play, cf. comm. ad loc.) at Ath. 10.426a: κατὰ τοὺς Ἄμφιδος Ἐρίθους. Already in 1623 AD Grotius, in the margin of Stobaeus' text (4.15[a].4), translated this title as Carminatrices ("female wool combers"), and later Meineke (1,406) considered this an infelicitous interpretation, unless – as he pointed out – we read τάς in Athenaeus' text ("nisi legendum τάς"). Codex Marcianus is the only source preserving the controversial article. Codices C and E omit the play's title altogether at Ath. 10.426a (φησί που Ἄμφις). Arnott (2000: 45) is keen to point out that, despite being a careful scribe, John the Calligrapher had no pretensions to scholarship. And, to prove this, Arnott describes, as an example, how the scribe failed to undestand the meaning of Ath. 6.224e (where Athenaeus quotes Amphis fr. 30 – cf. comm. ad loc.), and tried to fill out the text's missing syllables, which the comic poet had purposefully left out. Indeed, mistakes are not an unusual phenomenon in the text of Athenaeus. Apart from Arnott's glaring remark, there are several other cases in Athenaeus' text where the passages cited (i) are tangential to the stated purpose and / or (ii) entail some sort of inconsistency, e. g. 3.99f (two quotations do not contain the term χορτάζομαι whose usage they were supposed to demonstrate; cf. Amphis fr. 28 "Citation Context"), 3.106a (Eubulus fr. 110; cf. Hunter 1983: 211), 9.381c-e (Dionys.Com. fr. 3; cf. Papachrysostomou 174–175); see Oellacher (1916) 152–153.

Rather than assuming that the scribe of codex A (John the Calligrapher; cf. Intro. 3 "Tradition & Reception") simply copied a mistake that was already there, I believe that we need to envisage seriously the possibility that John the Calligrapher "corrected" the text's original τάς into τούς (at Ath. 10.426a) to match what he thought was a masculine noun (ἔριθος, being a noun of the second declension, naturally produces a tricky, masculine-looking, ending -ους in the accusative plural). This kind of interference in Athenaeus' text would not be unparalleled; we already know that at Ath. 6.224d (= Amphis fr. 30) John the Calligrapher added three initial syllables (τε-ττάρων, ὀ-βολῶν, ὀ-κτώ), for he failed to understand that these syllables (τε-, ὀ-, ὀ- ; Amphis fr. 30.12–13) had been purposely left out by Amphis (cf. Amphis fr. 30 "Constitution of Text").

Edmonds (2,320) already prints the play's title with the feminine definite article (Αἱ Ἔριθοι) and corrects τούς into τάς. If we are willing to take that leap of (scholarly) faith and interpret Amphis' Day-Labourers in a more precise way, i. e. as female wool-workers, the entire play will make not only much better but also much more fascinating sense. Indeed, the possibility that we may be dealing with female wool-workers is thought-provoking, since we have solid evidence that wool-working and prostitution were in certain contexts interchangeable activities in antiquity. The connection between the two has been a controversial issue ever since the publication of Rodenwaldt's article in 1932 "Spinnende Hetären". Since then, the connection between the two occupations has been staunchly supported, rigorously challenged, and again firmly reestablished, in view of the convergent literary, archaeological, and iconographic evidence.

The common and popularly used appellation for brothels was ἐργαστήρια, i. e. places of work. Indeed, the work carried out therein frequently extended beyond prostitution; brothels commonly doubled as textile factories. This is substantiated – for both the fifth and the fourth centuries BC – by the excavations in the area of Ceramicus; over one hundred loom-weights have been found in the now known as "building Z", which is believed to have been a brothel. Additionally, a large number of vases, perfume bottles, and cups featuring female wool-workers approached by men are thought to belong to the same context of intertwined activities. Even a number of manumitted women designated as ταλασιουργοί (wool-workers) on Attic inscriptions of the fourth century have been convincingly identified as hetairai who regularly practised wool-working as a second job to supplement their income; see Wrenhaven 2009. The existing bibliography on the multifaceted socio-economic phenomenon of the "Spinning Hetairai" is vast; among the most substantial discussions (in addition to the aforementioned ones) are Keuls (1985) 252–258; Davidson (1997) 83–91, 112–113; Ferrari (2002) 11–20; Lewis (2002) 188–189, 194–199.

fr. 17 (17 K.)

εἶτ' οὐχὶ χρυσοῦν ἐστι πρᾶγμ' ἐρημία;
ὁ πατήρ γε τοῦ ζῆν ἐστιν ἀνθρώποις ἀγρός, πενίαν τε συγκρύπτειν ἐπίσταται μόνος, ἄστυ δὲ θέατρον {ἐστιν} ἀτυχίας σαφοῦς γέμον

4 ἐστιν SMA: del. Grotius Dict. p. 215 σαφοῦς A: -ῶς SM: del. Edmonds de Grotii emendatione dubitans Hense 'vide ne verba σαφῶς γέμον', inquit, 'de suo addiderit florilegus. urbs est quasi theatrum infortunii'. possis ἐστιν … σαφῶς {γέμον} (vix / γέμον) PCG

Is not then solitude golden?
Indeed, for humans the country is the father of life, and is the only one that knows to cover up poverty, while town is a theatre full of clear ill-luck

Stob. 4.15[a].4 (περὶ γεωργίας ὅτι ἀγαθόν / on agriculture being virtuous) p. 377 H. (codd. SMA)
Ἄμφιδος Ἐρίθων· εἶτ' — γέμον

From Amphis, from "The Day-Labourers": "Is — ill-luck"

Metre Iambic trimeter

1. ––⏑– ––⏑|– ⏑–⏑– (hephthemimeral caesura)
2. ⏑⏑–⏑– –|–⏑– ––⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
3. ⏑⏑–⏑|– ––⏑– ⏑–⏑– (triemimeral caesura)
4. –⏑⏑⏑– ⏑|⏑⏑⏑– ⏑–⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)

Discussion Meineke 3,308; Bothe 483; Kock 2,241; Edmonds 2,320f.; PCG 2,221; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 299; Papachrysostomou 66–68

Citation Context This fragment is part of a long series of passages cited by Stobaeus in Book 4, chapter 15a of his Anthology, under the general rubric Περὶ γεωργίας ὅτι ἀγαθόν: On agriculture being virtuous. This chapter is a heterogeneous amalgam comprising nineteen passages from both poetry and prose, from various genres and dates, and of diverse length, all of which argue the case in favour of agriculture and rural life. Several of the passages quoted here belong to the comic genre, e. g. Ar. Ach. 32–36, Nu. 43–45, Pax 556–557, Men. frr. 1 and 301. Many of the shorter passages sound fairly apophthegmatic; e. g. Men. fr. 301 and Phocylides fr. 7 (both immediately following Amphis' present fragment). In the next chapter (4.15b), Stobaeus collects a number of different passages that make the case against husbandry (Εἰς τὸ ἐναντίον).

Constitution of Text On Stobaeus' manuscript tradition see Intro. 3 ("Tradition & Reception"). Line 4 is problematic; all three codices (SMA) preserve ἐστιν, which however makes the line metrically incorrect. In order for the line to scan correctly, one of the following three words needs to be deleted: ἐστιν, σαφοῦς or γέμον. Grotius in the early seventeenth century was the first editor who deleted ἐστιν. Hense's doubt and consequent remark that "σαφῶς γέμον" may be Stobaeus' own words can be neither confirmed nor rejected. What is important to emphasise here is that, unlike γέμον and σαφοῦς, the presence of ἐστιν in the text is completely unnecessary, since this is a copula and – even when absent – the overall sense remains unaffected. Therefore, I choose to delete ἐστιν and keep in the text both σαφοῦς and γέμον instead. Although the difference in meaning between σαφοῦς and σαφῶς is minimal, I choose the former since it complements nicely the genitive ἀτυχίας.

Interpretation The fragment thematically belongs in the widespread comic tradition of idealisation of the countryside against life in the city. The speaker eulogises the countryside (ἀγρός), along with the solitude one can experience there. He grandiloquently refers to the countryside as the "father of life" (l. 2) and argues that only there can poverty be passed unnoticed (l. 3). What is also noteworthy about this fragment is the metatheatrical effect produced by the metaphor in l. 4.

In Aristophanes there is a fundamental and frequently voiced contrast between life in the countryside as being good and life in the city as being bad, in the sense that the latter is needlessly sophisticated and/or bothersome in various ways; e. g. Nu. 41–55 (Strepsiades' country upbringing is contrasted with the city sophistication of his wife, epitomized in l. 47 ἄγροικος ὢν ἐξ ἄστεως: I a rustic, she from town), Pax 1185–1186 (countrymen less privileged than city-men regarding civic matters), Av. 27–48 (Euelpides complaining about Athenians' constant litigation), Ec. 431–434 (country people being smarter in the Assembly than city people). See further Ehrenberg ([3]1962) 73–94. Additionally, the Aristophanic characters often associate countryside with peace and nostalgia of idyllic times before the outbreak of the Peloponnesian war, and they regularly express this through erotic language; e. g. Ach. 32–33 ἀποβλέπων εἰς τὸν ἀγρόν, εἰρήνης ἐρῶν / στυγῶν μὲν ἄστυ, τὸν δ' ἐμὸν δῆμον ποθῶν (while I gaze off to the countryside and pine for peace, loathing the city and yearning for my own deme); Eq. 805–807; Pax 556, 582–586 (584–586 σῷ γὰρ ἐδάμην πόθῳ, / δαιμόνια βουλόμενος / εἰς ἀγρὸν ἀνερπύσαι: I'm overcome with longing for you in my amazing desire to head back to the country); etc. Particularly conspicuous is the case of Peace, where the return to the countryside ("εἰς ἀγρόν") becomes a leit-motif (Olson 1998: 190).

The motif of idealisation of countryside survives in New Comedy (e. g. Menander frr. 1, 301; Philem. fr. 74), and can also be considered a forerunner of the Hellenistic bucolic (the pastoral descriptions of landscapes, flocks, and labourers in Theocritus reveal the same nostalgia and love for the countryside, e. g. Idyll 25 – cf. Chryssafis 1981, Gow [2]1952: ii.438–474). For further discussion on various aspects of Attic countryside see Osborne 1987 and Burford [2]1994.

The fragment's other intriguing issue is metatheatricality. In l. 4 city (ἄστυ) is assimilated to a theatre, in a way strongly reminiscent of Shakespeare's famous line "all the world's a stage" (As You Like It, 2/7). This metaphor adds a metatheatrical element to the scene; the speaker is in the theatre when he recites these lines; cf. Kokolakis (1960) 19. The "town like a theatre" theme finds itself especially at home in Athens, a town that very much resembled a theatre, not only because of the abundance of dramatic performances, but also from a socio-political point of view. Throughout the fifth and fourth centuries BC Athens was the arena of every kind of performance – in the widest sense of the word. The speeches delivered in the law courts and the Assembly, the songs sung at symposia, the athletic activities taking place in the gymnasia or at athletic contests, the philosophical debates, were all types of performance, which made Athens seem like a vibrant venue of various civic activities, where the roles of actors and spectators were constantly interchangeable among Athenian citizens. See Goldhill & Osborne (1999) passim (but esp. 1–29, 257–289); Lape (2004) 68–109; Hall (2006) 353–392; Ruffell (2011) 214–260, 311–313.

The speaker's identity can only be surmised. He could be a farmer who left the countryside for the town and is now dreaming of it or a city resident who fled the town for the country and is now expressing his relief; it could be argued both ways. His financial situation though is more easily gleaned; he worries about poverty and considers the countryside as the ideal cover-up for it. Hence, with all probability, he is a fairly poor character. The plot of the play could be taking place either in the city or in the country (though it is rather unlikely that there was a change of venue at any point of the play). Whatever the case, it is possible that some event, proving the truth of the speaker's statement, has just taken place.

1a εἶτ' οὐχί] εἶτ' οὐ and its more emphatic form εἶτ' οὐχί are commonly used in (Middle) Comedy as stereotypical ways to introduce a rhetorical question that often leads to a quasi-philosophising soliloquy by the comic character. See further commentary with examples on Amphis fr. 1.1a s. v. εἶτ' οὐ.

1b χρυσοῦν The adjective χρυσοῦς is used here metaphorically, meaning splendid, marvellous, grand; see also Antiph. fr. 173, Alex. fr. 131.4–5 νόμον τινὰ / χρυσοῦν (a wonderful law; cf. Arnott 1996: 382). See LSJ[9] s. v. III.

1c ἐρημία With reference to a place, the term ἐρημία means wilderness; with reference to a state of being, ἐρημία means solitude / loneliness (cf. LSJ[9] s. v.); both senses are present in this fragment. The speaker praises and treasures the countryside's wilderness, for the latter provides him with solitude / loneliness. Since we lack both the fragment's immediate context and the play's plot, it is hard to establish with certainty whether the speaker's fondness of ἐρημία resembles the case of Dicaeopolis in Ar. Ach. 32–36 (who longs mainly for peace that he associates with rural life; cf. Olson 2002: 77–79) or the case of Knemon in Men. Dysc. 169 (who is a disagreeable misanthrope and naturally longs for loneliness).

2a ὁ πατήρ γε τοῦ ζῆν A phrasal and notional hapax; i. e. a novel expression that communicates an equally original concept. This is entirely Amphis' own inventive creation. The noun πατήρ, in the sense of primordial generator, has always been reserved for Zeus and has almost come to become a cult epithet of his, mostly in the stereotypical expression πατὴρ ἀνδρῶν τε θεῶν τε (e. g. Il. 1.544, Od. 1.28, Hes. Th. 542 etc.). Cf. also πατὴρ Ζεύς (e. g. Il. 4.235, S. Ph. 1442); πατέρ' Οὐρανιδᾶν … Ζῆνα (Pi. P. 4.194); ὁ τῶν ἁπάντων Ζεὺς πατὴρ Ὀλύμπιος (S. Tr. 275), etc. Pindar also describes Time as the father of all: Χρόνος ὁ πάντων πατήρ (O. 2.17). But the concept that country (ἀγρός) is the father of life for humans (ἀνθρώποις) is a novel concept. In fact, this idea is so radical that it prompts one to wonder whether it was somehow central to the play's plot and whether this fragment originates from the protagonist's expository soliloquy (probably upon his first appearance on stage, in or near the play's prologue) – e. g. in a way parallel to the expository soliloquies of both Strepsiades (who describes his dire situation at the beginning of Aristophanes' Clouds, ll. 41–55), and Knemon (who grumbles about his wretchedness when he first appears in Menander's Dyscolus, ll. 153–168).

2b ἀγρός The term ἀγρός (and ἀγροί in plural) designates the countryside / the fields, and is regularly contrasted to city – identified as either ἄστυ (as here; cf. Ar. fr. 109) or πόλις (Od. 1.185, Epich. fr. 219, etc.). Particularly in Comedy this antithesis grows into a comic topos (see further "Interpretation" above). Amphis' present fragment not only belongs in this country-good vs. city-bad contrast, but it also develops it further conceptually, since the countryside is personified: the speaker assigns to the countryside the qualities of reason and intellect. As if it were a human being, ἀγρός knows very well (ἐπίσταται) how to hide poverty (and thus be a safe shelter for its residents); in addition, it is the only one (μόνος – emphatically positioned at line-end) who knows how to do this.

3a πενίαν Poverty enters the comic register fairly late, though it (or rather, she) makes a grand entrance: Πενία is personified by Aristophanes in Wealth and is brought on stage as an old hag, who deftly argues in favour of her indispensable role in the world (418–609); see Newiger (1957) 155–164, Kennedy (1963) 167–173, Sommerstein (1996a), Papageorgiou (2000) 19–34, 196–205. After Aristophanes' Wealth there are only sporadic references to poverty in Comedy; e. g. Antiph. frr. 165 and 322 (praise of poverty), Aristopho fr. 1, Men. Dysc. 209–211.

3b πενίαν συγκρύπτειν Impoverishment was a real problem in the Attic countryside during the fourth century BC; see Ehrenberg ([3]1962) 93; Mossé (1973) 12–17; Strauss (1986) 42–45, 53–55; Austin ([2]1994).

The main advantage that the speaker associates with countryside is that poverty can be more easily hidden there than in the city. The reasoning behind this statement is missing; either it was explained by the speaker in the text now lost or it was somehow made manifest to the spectators through preceding or following episodic scenes. A possible explanation why poverty is less noticeable in the countryside is because the latter is less densely populated than the city; hence, fewer people get to know an individual's financial situation. Yet, in Lysias 7.18 we hear how neighbours manage to find out about nearly everything: ἀλλὰ καὶ περὶ ὧν ἀποκρυπτόμεθα μηδένα εἰδέναι, καὶ περὶ ἐκείνων πυνθάνονται (but they even get information of what we try to keep hidden from the knowledge of anyone; cf. Id. 7.28). See also the proverb (App. Prov. 4.31 = adesp. fr. 434 Kock) ὀξύτερον οἱ γείτονες βλέπουσι τῶν ἀλωπέκων (neighbours see more sharply than foxes). But, despite this evidence, solidarity was a prevalent feature of the countryside; "lending to neighbours, relatives and friends was part and parcel of everyday life" (Osborne 1987: 93; and see the whole chapter 93–112). An alternative – not mutually exclusive with the above – explanation is that in the countryside poverty is not exactly covered up, but – theoretically, at least – it may be more easily battled and coped with, since the countryside offered more job opportunities; in the countryside there was land available for farmers to cultivate (even if the land was not one's own), in addition to mines and quarries, and so a countryman could hardly ever be left without daily wage – albeit probably meager. See Osborne (1987) 27–52, 75–92.

Intriguingly, there survive two passages from Menander that are strikingly reminiscent of Amphis' present fragment. The first is Georg. 76–82:

> … ἄπεισιν εἰς ἀγρὸν
> αὐτὴ]ν λαβών. παύσεσθ[ε] πενίᾳ μαχόμενοι, > δυσνουθετήτῳ θηρίῳ καὶ δυσκόλῳ, > κ]αὶ ταῦτ' [ἐν] ἄστει. δεῖ γὰρ ἢ πλουτεῖν ἴσως > 80 ἢ ζῆν ὅπως μὴ μάρτυρας τ[ο]ῦ δυστυχεῖν > πολλούς τις ἕξει τοὺς ὁρῶντας. ἔστι δὲ > ἀγρὸ]ς εἰς τὸ τοιοῦτ' εὐκτὸν ἥ τ' ἐρημία.
>
> He'll take [her] off to his farm.
> Your battle with that obstinate, perverse brute poverty > and [in] the city too will cease. One should be rich, perhaps > or live without a crowd of witnesses to notice one's bad luck.
> In such conditions [country] solitude's the answer.

The other is Men. fr. 299: ὅστις πένης ὢν ζῆν ἐν ἄστει βούλεται, / ἀθυμότερον ἑαυτὸν ἐπιθυμεῖ ποιεῖν … ἐν ἀγρῷ γὰρ οἰκῶν … εἶχεν δὲ παραπέτασμα τὴν ἐρημίαν (anyone who, being a pauper, wishes to live in the city, he is just after losing his spirit for life … though by living in the countryside … he could use solitude as a cover).

A key reason behind this strong desire to hide misfortune is that poverty can be one's own fault; see Dover (1974) 236–242, 109–113.

4a ἄστυ δὲ θέατρον ἀτυχίας σαφοῦς γέμον The speaker/actor standing on and speaking from the theatrical stage parallels the city to the theatre, thus producing a strong self-referential, metatheatrical effect, on which he might have elaborated in the following lines, now lost (see "Interpretation" above); cf. Amphis fr. 21.4. Likewise, Isocrates famously assimilates the Popular Assembly to a theatre and calls the Athenian citizens to imagine they are acting on a panhellenic stage (6.106): δεῖ δὲ μηδὲ τοῦτο λανθάνειν ὑμᾶς, ὅτι πάντες τῷ συλλόγῳ τούτῳ καὶ τοῖς γνωσθησομένοις ὑφ᾽ ἡμῶν προσέχουσι τὸν νοῦν. Ὥσπερ οὖν ἐν κοινῷ θεάτρῳ τῶν Ἑλλήνων διδοὺς ἔλεγχον ἕκαστος ὑμῶν τῆς αὑτοῦ φύσεως, οὕτω διακείσθω τὴν γνώμην (Nor must you forget that the attention of the whole world is fixed upon this assembly and on the decision which you shall reach here. Let each one of you, therefore, govern his thoughts as one who is giving an account of his own character in a public theater, as it were, before the assembled Hellenes).

4b ἀτυχίας Given the assimilation of the city to the theatre, the term ἀτυχία (ill-luck) needs to be interpreted in both contexts: the civic and the dramatic. In civic context, ἀτυχία designates all sorts of hardship that result from πενία (poverty; l.3), e. g. daily privation with feelings of shame and inferiority (cf. Dover 1974: 236–242). In (meta)dramatic context, this is a rare – at least for Middle Comedy – case of abuse of the spectators; ἀτυχία is hardly flattering to the theatre and its audience. A theatre full of ill-luck reflects the poet's low expectations of receiving (first) prize, the reason being that he was not fortunate enough to come across an erudite audience who would instantly detect and appreciate the quality and/or originality of his ideas. Within Old Comedy abuse of the spectators occurs to a much greater degree, in a more direct way, and usually in the parabasis; cf. Aristophanes' strong complaint in the anapaests of Wasps (esp. 1016–1017, 1043–1059) about being utterly betrayed by the audience (καταπρούδοτε, l. 1044) and ending up with only the third prize at the previous year's competition (production of Clouds at the Great Dionysia of 423 BC); cf. Ar. Nu. 518–562 (written for the play's second performance), Ach. 366–384; Eup. fr. 392, etc. See further Heath (1987) 21–24; Henderson (1990); Hubbard (1991) 13–15; and Silk (2000) 301–349 (who discusses Heath's and Henderson's views from a different perspective).

fr. 18 (18 K.)

ὁ παῖς σοβείτω τοῖς ποτηρίοις συχνούς συχνούς A: -ούς, superscr. -ά CE: -οῖς Casaub.: -ῶς Bothe

Let the servant ply us unremittingly with cups

Ath. 10.426a
ἐγὼ δὲ κατὰ τοὺς Ἄμφιδος Ἐρίθους παρακελεύομαι (φησί που Ἄμφις CE) ὁ — συχνούς

But I give this advice drawn from Amphis' "The Day-Labourers": "Let — cups"

Metre Iambic trimeter

⏑–⏑– –|–⏑– ⏑–⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)

Discussion Meineke 3,308; Bothe 483; Kock 2,241; Edmonds 2,320f.; PCG 2,221

Citation Context This fragment is cited by Athenaeus in the course of an all-encompassing discussion about symposia (e. g. recommended behaviour of hosts and guests; wine-drinking; terms for wine-cups; appellations for professionals / attendants, etc.). The fragment is an order to a slave to keep pouring wine around, and its quotation is naturally prompted in Athenaeus' text; Ulpian (the symposiarch) has just been pictured draining his cup (ἐκπίνων 10.425f: present participle, and ἐκπιών 426a: past participle). Having finished his drink, Ulpian asks for more wine and displays his erudition by quoting Amphis' present fragment.

Luckily, codex A (Marcianus) preserves the origin of this line (unlike the Epitome codices C and E). See discussion about the play's title.

Constitution of Text The Epitome codices C and E (cf. Arnott 2000 and Intro. 3 "Tradition & Reception") leave out the play's title. The reading συχνούς is preserved by codex A (and adopted by Kassel & Austin); it makes perfect sense and scans correctly. Yet, Casaubon and other scholars who proposed emendations seem to have been misled by the fragmentary nature of this line, in which the object of σοβείτω is missing (probably ἡμᾶς), to which the accusative plural συχνούς corresponds grammatically and syntactically as a predicate adjective (cf. Smyth 1956: §1040b). Casaubon's suggestion συχνοῖς (adopted by Meineke and Kock) would turn συχνοῖς into a predicate adjective to ποτηρίοις and this would be syntactically incorrect, since a predicate adjective is incompatible with a definite article (τοῖς); cf. Smyth (1956) §§912–913, 1118, 1120. Bothe's suggestion συχνῶς is simply unnecessary, and may also be considered pleonastic, since the notion of cumulative repetition is already communicated, and emphatically so, by σοβείτω. Besides, Eub. fr. 48 (cf. comm. below) is a strong parallel for the reading συχνούς. Finally, the superscript reading συχνά preserved by codices C and E does not make any sense, grammatically or syntactically.

Interpretation The fragment belongs in a drinking-bout context, which could be part of a broader symposion milieu (about feasts narrated but never reenacted on stage see "Interpretation" on Amphis frr. 9 and 16). Someone orders a slave to keep bringing cups – full of wine, of course. The speaker must be a member of the drinking party, probably the symposiarch/host and the slave's owner, though this order could also be delivered by any of the guests. The verb chosen for this order, σοβέω (used metaphorically), is rather strong for this context and reveals – in combination with συχνούς (cf. comm. s. v.) a certain mirth and impatience on the speaker's behalf. It is possible that the drinking has been going on for a while now, the banqueters are already tipsy and are asking for unlimited wine flowing incessantly in their cups.

σοβείτω The prime literal sense of the verb σοβέω is to scare away, drive along (mostly flocks of birds, animals, and the like; cf. Ar. Av. 34, Luc. Cat. 3); see further LSJ[9] s. v. Here the verb is used figuratively, to designate the notion of plying someone with a drink. Σοβέω has further figurative meanings (e. g. in passive voice to be agitated), but this is the only instance of it meaning to ply. It is noteworthy that the order is given in the third person imperative (σοβείτω), despite the fact that the addressee (the slave) was apparently either present or in the immediate vicinity of the speaker. Addressing someone who is present in third person reveals a certain arrogance on the speaker's behalf, who is distancing himself from and condescending to the addressee; cf. X. Sym. 2.23 ὁ παῖς ἐγχεάτω μοι τὴν μεγάλην φιάλην (let the servant fill me up the big goblet).

συχνούς The adjective συχνός can define a noun that is in either plural or singular, to designate abundance of number and/or great frequency of recurrence (cf. LSJ[9] s. v.). Here συχνός combines well with σοβέω to communicate emphatically the notion of incessantly serving an abundance of wine, one round after another. The presence of both terms within one same line reveals the speaker's enthusiasm, eagerness for more wine and – probably – tipsiness.

Intringingly, the same notion of having someone excessively and repeatedly plied with wine (or wine-related stuff) is present in a number of comic fragments; e. g. Eub. fr. 48 (here συχνός is used in a way parallel to Amphis' fragment, i. e. as a predicate adjective positioned at line-end, at a distance from its referent, βότρυς): ἀλλὰ παραλαβὼν ἀκράτῳ κροῦε καὶ δίδου πυκνὰς / καὶ βότρυς τρώγειν ἀνάγκαζ' αὐτὸν ἐξ οἴνου συχνούς (but take him with you and keep clobbering him with unmixed wine; give him one drink after another, and force him to eat many grapes packed in wine), Timocl. fr. 22 πατάξω τ' ἴσον ἴσῳ ποτηρίοις / μεγάλοις ἅπασαν τὴν ἀλήθειαν φράσαι (I'll smack you into telling me the whole truth, by using big cups mixed one-to-one), Aristopho fr. 13.5: εἶτ' ἐλευθέραν ἀφῆκε βαπτίσας ἐρρωμένως (he then set me free, having soused me overwhelmingly in wine; cf. Papachrysostomou 2008: 149). See also Alex. fr. 88, Eub. fr. 136, Theopomp. fr. 41.

fr. 19 (19 K.)

Phot. ν 73 = Sud. ν 113
ν ε α ν ι σ κ ε ύ ε τ α ι· Ἄμφις Ἐρίθοις, Ποσείδιππος Δημόταις, Εὔπολις Αἰξίν

"h e i s i n h i s y o u t h"; Amphis in "The Day-Labourers", Posidippus in "Demesmen" (fr. 10), and Eupolis in "Goats" (fr. 32)

Metre Iambic trimeter
⏑– ––⏑–

Discussion Meineke 3,308; Bothe 483; Kock 2,241; Edmonds 2,320f.; PCG 2,222

Citation Context The verb νεανισκεύεται is contained in two lemmata of two lexica from later antiquity, Photius (ν 73) and Suda (ν 113). With all probability, both sources (ninth and tenth century AD respectively) draw directly on a much earlier work, namely Phrynichus' Praeparatio Sophistica, fr. 338* (second century AD). What all three sources try to highlight are the earliest occurrences of the verb νεανισκεύομαι. The earliest is Eup. fr. 32, followed by Amphis' present fragment and Posidipp. fr. 10. One early prose instance, X. Cyr. 1.2.15, is detected and registered by Poll. 2.20.

Interpretation Very little can be said with certainty about this single surviving word. Apparently, some character in the play was in a state of young manhood. Perhaps this statement was meant as justification (or simply description) of this person's high-spirited behaviour that might have led to various (perhaps infelicitous) incidents within the play (cf. Plu. 12b). On young age as potential source of troubles see comm. on Amphis fr. 33 s. v. νεανικόν. Regarding the present fragment any further comment would be mere surmise; so, suffice it to say that Amphis' fondness for originality (see Intro. 6 "Language") is revealed once more: the present usage of the verb νεανισκεύομαι is the third earliest one (behind Eupolis and Xenophon; cf. "Citation Context") within Greek literature.

Ἰάλεμος (Ialemos)
("Ialemos")

Discussion Kock 2,241; PCG 2,222f.; Papachrysostomou 68–78

Title Another Middle Comedy playwright, Ophelio, wrote a homonymous play (PCG 7,97; the one surviving fragment is not instructive as to the play's content).

In Greek mythology Ialemos is the personification of lament/dirge. He is one of the three sons of Apollo and Calliope (the other two being Hymenaeus and Orpheus). The earliest reference to Ialemos is Pindar Thren. 3, fr. 128c; this is preserved in the ancient scholia to [E.] Rh. 895 where we are also told that Θρῆνος (the choral poem of lament) used to be called Ἰάλεμος, in honour of this mythical figure (προωνομάσθαι ἐπὶ τιμῇ Ἰαλέμου τοῦ Ἀπόλλωνος καὶ Καλλιόπης, ὥς φησι Πίνδαρος). Cf. Asclepiades fr. 8 FHG III.313 (= sch. on Pi. P. 4.313) Ἀπόλλωνος καὶ Καλλιόπης Ὑμέναιον, Ἰάλεμον, Ὀρφέα.

Apart from the mythical figure's name, the word ἰάλεμος is used (i) as a noun, meaning lament sung as a dirge (Ar. Byz. fr. 340 Sl.; E. Ph. 1033–1034); (ii) as a substantive, meaning dullard, oaf, or cold-hearted, indifferent, worthless person (Men. fr. 177); (iii) as an adjective, meaning melancholic, dull, stupid, frigid, woeful (Gal. 14.617 of doctors; Luc. Pseudol. 24 of poets). Cf. Moer., Hsch., Phot., and Sud. s. v.; also the proverb Ἰαλέμου ψυχρότερος (Zenob. 4.39). See further LSJ[9] s. v.

Regarding the subject/content of Amphis' play, the title Ialemos allows for more than one interpretation. One possibility (suggested by Kaibel RE s. v. Amphis nr. 2) is that the play dealt with modern music (perhaps in a way parallel to Amphis' engagement with contemporary musical trends in his Dithyramb; cf. comm. ad loc.). Another possibility (advanced by Breitenbach 1908: 105) is that the title was meant as a nickname of a frigid/stupid person, similar to e. g. Phrynichus' Monotropos, Plato's Perialges, etc. (cf. Breitenbach 1908: 71–74 for several comic plays featuring humorous nicknames in their titles). Alternatively, a reasonable assumption is that the play dealt – to some, unknown, extent – with the mythical figure of Ialemos. Mythical themes are not uncommon within Amphis' work. It is impossible though to establish how much or how little pure mythical material featured in the play. In any case, the three surviving fragments reflect snapshots from contemporary reality rather than myth. Hence, it is highly probable that what we have here is yet another case of Middle Comedy's much loved and universally applied twofold pattern, i. e. mythical burlesque and simultaneous intertwinement of traditional myth with reality; cf. Intro. 4 ("Themes & Motifs"). It is possible that anachronistic elements from real life infiltrated the mythical world of Ialemos and / or Ialemos was presented in a context resembling the fourth century world; in either case, it is reasonable to assume that the comic figure of Ialemos retained certain features from his mythical counterpart, e. g. he was possibly portrayed as frigid, monotonous, and melancholic. But we cannot establish which one was the play's dominant sphere, the mythical or the real / contemporary one; neither can we say with certainty to what degree the myth remained unaltered. See Nesselrath (1990) 188–241, and 1995; Papachrysostomou (forthcoming). Whatever the case, it is noteworthy that the reference to lettuce in combination with male impotency (fr. 20) may be a significant thematic link to the frigidness implied by the title; but, again, we have no means of knowing whether this was a key parameter of the play or merely a tangential allusion.

fr. 20 (20 K.)

ἐν ταῖς θριδακίναις ταῖς κάκιστ' ἀπολουμέναις, ἃς εἰ φάγοι τις ἐντὸς ἑξήκοντ' ἐτῶν, ὁπότε γυναικὸς λαμβάνοι κοινωνίαν, στρέφοιθ' ὅλην τὴν νύκτ' ἂν οὐδὲ ἓν πλέον 5 ὧν βούλεται δρῶν, ἀντὶ τῆς ὑπουργίας τῇ χειρὶ τρίβων τὴν ἀναγκαίαν τύχην

4 νύκτ' ἂν οὐδὲ ἓν Meineke (νύκτ' ἂν οὐδέν τοι iam Burges 1807 p. 177c): νύκτα μηδὲν CE 6 τύχην CE: φύσιν Meineke

In the god-damned lettuces, which if anyone eats who is less than sixty years old, whenever he has sex with a woman,
he twists all night long without managing to perform 5 anything of what he wants, but, instead of any service, he rubs with his hand the fate that must be

Ath. (epit.) 2.69b-c
Ἄμφις τε ἐν Ἰαλέμῳ φησίν· ἐν —— τύχην

And Amphis says in "Ialemos": In —— be"

Metre Iambic trimeter

1. ——⏑⏑⏑ —|—⏑— ⏑⏑—⏑— (pethemimeral caesura)
2. ——⏑— ⏑|—⏑— ——⏑— (pethemimeral caesura)
3. ⏑⏑⏑⏑— —|—⏑— ——⏑— (pethemimeral caesura)
4. ⏑—⏑— ——⏑|— ⏑—⏑— (hephthemimeral caesura)
5. ——⏑— —|—⏑— ⏑—⏑— (pethemimeral caesura)
6. ——⏑— —|—⏑— ——⏑— (pethemimeral caesura)

Discussion Meineke 3,308f.; Bothe 483f.; Kock 2,241f.; Edmonds 2,320–322; PCG 2,222; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 299f.; Papachrysostomou 69–74

Citation Context The fragment is cited by Athenaeus 2.69b-c within a discussion about lettuce and its – widely claimed – anti-aphrodisiac effects (2.68f-70a). Though surviving only in Athenaeus' Epitome, where play-titles are regularly left out (cf. Arnott 2000: 47), we are fortunate enough to know the precise play to which this fragment belongs.

Constitution of Text In l. 4 codices C and E preserve the reading νύκτα μηδέν, which renders the line metrically incomplete, since the last meter misses its final two elements (a brevis and the final longum). In addition, the apodosis of the conditional clause misses the ἄν (we have only στρέφοιθ'), though this alone would not constitute an adequate reason for us to alter the text, since the bare (i. e. without the ἄν) optative with potential sense is a rare syntactical phenomenon, which occurs already in Homer (e. g. Il. 15.45) and elsewhere in Comedy (e. g. Cratin. fr. 342); cf. Bers (1984) 128–135. But even if we allow for this rare syntactical peculiarity, the line remains metrically unremedied. Therefore, following Kassel & Austin, I chose to adopt Meineke's emendation νύκτ' ἂν οὐδὲ ἓν (based on Burges' earlier suggestion, 1807: 177c), which provides for both a flawless iambic trimeter line and a textbook case of a less vivid future condition (fourth form of conditions; cf. Smyth 1956: §§ 2297, 2329), i. e. εἰ with the optative in protasis: εἰ φάγοι (l. 2), ἄν with the optative in apodosis: στρέφοιτο … ἂν (l. 4). It is worth noting that Meineke's emendation does not provide for elision of the final epsilon of οὐδὲ (οὐδὲ ἓν). However, this should not be a reason not to adopt this reading, since hiatus between οὐδέ and εἷς / ἕν occurs frequently in Comedy. Apart from serving metrical convenience, it also emphasises the nihility in question; see Ar. Pl. 138, Cratin. fr. 335, Alex. fr. 27.3 (cf. Arnott 1996: 122), Men. Asp. 234, etc. This phenomenon is not limited in Comedy; cf. e. g. Herod. 1.48, and Theoc. 23.3, whereupon Gow notes that "it is not common in serious poetry" (^{2}1952: ii.408). See further Kühner-Blass (^{3}1890–1904) I §48.3; Moorhouse (1962) 245–247.

In l. 6 Meineke suggested the replacement of the reading τύχην (preserved by codices C and E) with φύσιν, based on the parallel cases of Philem. fr. 3.6 (ἀναγκαίαν φύσιν) and Ar. Nu 1075 (φύσεως ἀνάγκας; cf. Dover 1968: 227). Both Philemo's and Aristophanes' passages refer to sexual activity, as does Amphis' present fragment; yet, this is not a good enough reason to alter what the manuscript tradition unanimously preserves; cf. comm. s. v. ἀναγκαίαν τύχην below.

Interpretation This fragment is a rare example of obscenity in Middle Comedy. It graphically describes a case of male sexual impotence and also features male masturbation. There is a thematic kinship with Aristophanes, where masturbation features regularly as a comic topos, being particularly – but not exclusively – associated with slaves; cf. Nu. 734 (Strepsiades), Ra. 753 (slaves), Eq. 24–25 (slaves); cf. the ancient scholia for all these passages.

But, to be precise, despite dealing with the physiology of sex, the language of the present fragment, though erotic, is not openly obscene. Combining allusion with wordplay, the language becomes relatively evasive. The obscene meaning is concealed under terms that in a different context would not necessarily allude to sex (κοινωνία, δρῶν, ὑπουργία, etc.; cf. comm. below s. vv.), and the fragment concludes with a case of paratragedy (l. 6 ἀναγκαία τύχη). Indeed, the refinement and attenuation – not the elimination – of obscene language is a prominent feature of the Middle Comedy period. Obscenity – at varying degrees – is also present in other fourth century comic poets; e. g. Philetaer. frr. 6 and 9 (cf. Papachrysostomou 2008: 222–224, 228–236), Theophil. fr. 6 (cf. Papachrysostomou 2008: 263–266). For further obscene instances from both Middle Comedy and Menander see Papachrysostomou (2008) 19.

The impotence mentioned in the fragment is attributed to the consumption of lettuce. The connection between the two seems to originate from a combination of myth and medical knowledge; see further comm. s. v. θριδακίναις.

The fragment begins in the middle of the sentence, and any attempt to define the context would be mere guesswork. It could be that the speaker curses someone to end up in lettuces and suffer the consequences (cf. the phrase κάκιστ' ἀπολουμέναις, with comm. ad loc.). The speaker's identity is also indefinable. Here, as elsewhere, certainty is impossible.

1a θριδακίναις θριδακίνη is the Attic word for lettuce; whereas in both Ionic and Doric the equivalent term is θρίδαξ (ἡ), e. g. Hdt. 3.32, Epich. fr. 156.

Within Comedy the association of lettuce with impotence recurs in Eub. fr. 13, from his play Ἄστυτοι (Impotents; cf. Hunter 1983: 103–104). As mentioned above, this belief is the result of a dynamic interlacing between mythical tradition and scientific observation / medical knowledge. According to a myth recorded by Callimachus (fr. 478 Pf.), Aphrodite hid her mortal lover Adōnis (or/and Phaōn; see Cratin. fr. 370) in a bed of lettuce; cf. Apollod. 3.14.4 and Sappho fr. 211c Voigt (on the Athenian festival of Adōnia see Atallah 1966: 98–104, 211–216). Athenaeus attempts to interpret this myth (2.69c): ἀλληγορούντων τῶν ποιητῶν ὅτι ἀσθενεῖς εἰσι πρὸς ἀφροδίσια οἱ συνεχῶς χρώμενοι θρίδαξι (this is the poets' way of saying allegorically that men who eat too much lettuce lose their sexual powers). Indeed, the myth and its rationalisation reflect certain dietary / medicinal facts about lettuce; i. e. in medical texts there is a recurrent remark on the cooling qualities and the physically and/or sexually weakening effects of lettuce, e. g. Hp. Vict. 2.54.24–26 θρίδαξ ψυχρότερον πρὶν τὸν ὀπὸν ἔχειν· ἀσθενείην δέ τινα ἐμποιέει τῷ σώματι (lettuce is rather cooling before it has its juice, and produces a certain weakness in the body); Dsc. 2.136.1 θρίδαξ … ὑποψύχουσα, ὑπνωτική … τὸ δὲ σπέρμα αὐτῆς πινόμενον τοῖς συνεχῶς ὀνειρώττουσι βοηθεῖ καὶ συνουσίαν ἀποστρέφει (lettuce is rather cooling and soporific … its seed, if consumed as a drink, assists those who emit semen during sleep and subdues sexual desire); Gal. 14.951 λέλεκται ἡ τῶν ψυχόντων ὕλη … ὅ θ' ὑοσκύαμος καὶ ἡ θριδακίνη (I have spoken about the material of things that are cooling: … henbane, lettuce), etc. Pliny HN 19.127 identifies a particular variety of lettuce, called ἀστυτίδα, known to mitigate sexual instincts ("maxime refragetur veneri"); and, according to Lycus the Pythagorean (57.2 D-K, ap. Ath. 2.69e), lettuce was universally known as ἀστυτίς (impotence inducing) among women. Concluding the section on lettuce (2.68f-70a), Athenaeus resorts to Diphilus of Siphnus (third century BC) and records much of the latter's now lost work; cf. esp. 2.69e-f θρίδαξ εὐστόμαχος, ψυκτική, … ὑπνωτική … ἐφεκτικὴ τῆς πρὸς τὰ ἀφροδίσια ὁρμῆς (lettuce is easy on the stomach, cooling, … produces drowsiness … and checks sexual desire). Cf. Dalby (2003) 195–196.

1b κάκιστ' ἀπολουμέναις A frequently recurring stereotypical pattern of cursing, which consists of a combination of some form of the verb ἀπόλλυμαι (mostly future participle, as here, or optative of wish) with the adverb κακῶς, either in the positive degree or in the superlative (κάκιστα); plus, occasionally, the adjective κακός (in the same number, gender, and case as the accursed object). It can refer to either a person or an inanimate object (e. g. lettuce), and is found mostly in Comedy, and also in prose (where, rather than a curse, it is reduced to an abusive expression); e. g. Aesop. 21.4; Hdt. 1.112, 3.71; D. [7.45], 8.40, 19.325; Isoc. 17.55; Pherecr. fr. 22; Ar. Ach. 865, Pax 2, 1288, Ec. 1052; Alex. fr. 16; Antiph. frr. 159, 190; Men. Dysc. 208, etc. See Stevens (1976) 15 and Headlam (1922) 128–129 for numerous examples where epithets expressing commiseration and the like are applied to inanimate objects.

2 ἐντὸς ἑξήκοντ' ἐτῶν The weakening effect of lettuce appears to matter only to those under sixty years of age. The idea is presumably that after sixty male sexuality is terminated, and, thus, only sexually active people are affected by the consumption of lettuce. Regarding the duration of male potency, a number of passages prove illuminating; first, in Aeschines 1.11 we read that a chorus producer (χορηγός) should be over forty years of age (see Fisher 2001: comm. ad loc.); the meaning apparently being that after forty a man can control his natural desires, and not that he becomes impotent; cf. Aeschin. 1.24 and Dover (1974) 102–108. Furthermore, in Archil. fr. 48 (καὶ στῆθος, ὡς ἂν καὶ γέρων ἠράσσατο) an old man is tempted by a young woman's breast, and this kind of erotic incitement is emphasized as rather unexpected (through the concessive clause καὶ … ἠράσσατο: "despite being a γέρων, he was sexually stimulated"); see Anaxandrides' play Γεροντομανία (cf. Millis 2001: 45). But in Aristophanes' Wasps 1341–1387 a reversal of age typology takes place, which however is part of the general role-reversal between father and son (i. e. the rejuvenated Philocleon, perfectly potent, desires to have sex with a slave girl).

The preposition ἐντός followed by an age number is a typical expression designating the age limit below which something happens; e. g. Ar. Ec. 984 ἐντὸς εἴκοσιν, D. 43.62 ἐντὸς ἑξήκοντ' ἐτῶν, Aristox. fr. 39 ἐντὸς τῶν εἴκοσι ἐτῶν, App. BC 3.1.2 ἐντὸς εἴκοσι ἐτῶν, etc.

3a γυναικός Either a wedded wife or a hetaira may be denoted here. The text is deliberately imprecise; it focuses on the gender, not the status, of the sexual partner and is more interested in the man's impotence than any aspect of the woman.

3b κοινωνίαν This is one of the rare cases where the noun κοινωνία is employed euphemistically to define sexual intercourse; cf. E. Ba. 1276, Pl. Lg. 636c. See Poll. 3.44: ὁ δὲ γάμος καλοῖτ' ἂν καὶ … σύνοδος ἀνδρὸς καὶ γυναικὸς … καὶ κοινωνία ἐπὶ παίδων σπορᾷ (the marriage may also be called a union of husband and wife and sexual intercourse for the procreation of children). The verb κοινωνέω is not used very often with that sense; see LSJ[9] s. v. II.

4a στρέφοιθ' ὅλην τὴν νύκτ' Twisting and turning around all night long has been considered a sign of insomnia since Homer; e. g. Il. 24.5, Ar. Nu. 36, Men. Kith. fr. 1.3 Arn., Epict. Diss. Arr. 4.10.31, etc. However, the point in this fragment goes presumably beyond this. It is rather improbable that the character here tries to sleep. I would suggest that the reason why he stays awake twisting and tossing in bed is that he is either desperately trying to ejaculate or is changing sexual positions. It could also be a wrestling metaphor; i. e. he is doing his utmost to manage sexual gratification.

4b οὐδὲ ἓν … δρῶν Occasionally, the verb δράω is charged with sexual connotations, i. e. it implies the notion of performing sexual intercourse to successful completion; cf. Ar. V. 1381, ancient scholia on Ar. V. 1346, Stratt. fr. 41.2, Thgn. 954 (cf. Van Groningen 1966 ad loc.). This distinctive usage of δράω aligns with the fragment's general scope of attenuation of erotic language (cf. "Interpretation").

4–5 πλέον … δρῶν It is not uncommon for the adverb πλέον to combine with verbs meaning to do, without any comparison being drawn, in order to express the notion of success, fulfilment, accomplishment, and the like. Such verbs include ποιέω (mainly), πράττω, and ἐργάζομαι; e. g. Pl. Phd. 115c, Crit. 54d, Plu. Thes. 35.2. See LSJ[9] s. v. πλείων. It is in this way that πλέον combines with δράω in the present fragment, despite the fact that the usage of this particular verb is practically unparalleled (a limited number of passages that could be regarded as the closest parallels are still quite different, in that they convey a rather clear sense of comparison; e. g. E. Andr. 698, Plu. Ant. 42.1, D. C. Hist. Rom. 38.45.5). Hence, this rather atypical style should be attributed – apart from Amphis' ingenuity – to the speaker's frustration and fury.

5 ἀντὶ τῆς ὑπουργίας The preposition ἀντί here means instead, in the place of; cf. Kassel (1973) 100. The term ὑπουργία signifies the "service rendered", but here the sense is obscene and refers to sexual intercourse; see Henderson ([2]1991) 160. This distinctive use of the noun ὑπουργία has no parallels; but see Plato's use of the verb ὑπουργέω for offering sexual gratification in Smp. 184d; cf. Anaxil. fr. 21 and Hippon. fr. 114a. Still, in the present fragment there is no actual ὑπουργία, since no proper intercourse takes place. The male lover has been left impotent (apparently because of the lettuce), and cannot get an erection. Therefore, he resorts to masturbation in an attempt to get an erection, so that he can have sex.

6a τῇ χειρί The obscenity escalates. The "victim" of lettuces eventually turns to masturbation; cf. AP 12.232.6 οὐχ ἕξεις ἔλεον χειρὸς ἀφ' ἡμετέρης (there will not be any mercy from our hand).

6b ἀναγκαίαν τύχην The serious notion of implacable Fate is inserted amidst the comic context, which here is mostly obscene. Impotence is thus presented like a cruel and inescapable destiny for one eating lettuce. The notion of fate (τύχη) imposed by compulsion (ἀνάγκη) belongs primarily to the linguistic register and the notional repertoire of tragedy (see e. g. S. Aj. 485, 803, El. 48, Ph. 1317; E. IA 511; cf. also Pl. Lg. 806a). The simultaneous use of both notions (τύχη and ἀνάγκη) in Amphis' fragment, and especially in such a distinctively obscene context, constitutes a strong case of paratragedy. For paratragedy in Comedy (mostly Aristophanes) see Silk 1993 and (2000) 42–97; Taplin 1996; Dutta 2007; Manuwald 2014 (Roman Comedy). Due to the fragmentary nature of Middle Comedy, paratragedy is expectedly rarer in what survives of this period; e. g. Mnesim. fr. 3.7 (cf. Papachrysostomou 2008: 186) and fr. 4 (cf. Papachrysostomou 2008: 188, 197, 207–208). For ἀναγκαία / ἀνάγκη in a sexual context referring to natural urges see Ar. Nu. 1075 (τὰς τῆς φύσεως ἀνάγκας; cf. Dover 1968: 227), Philem. fr. 3.6 (ἀναγκαίαν φύσιν), etc. See further Henderson ([2]1991) 5, 76–77, 218.

6 τρίβων The verb τρίβειν means to rub, hence here to masturbate; but the object comes as a surprise, since one would expect e. g. τὸ πέος (the penis). The poet substitutes the expected concrete object with an abstract notion. This is a case of παρὰ προσδοκίαν, with the language fluctuating from a graphic and indecorous level (τρίβων) to a non-graphic and decorous one (ἀναγκαίαν τύχην).

fr. 21 (21 K.)

ὅστις δὲ θνητὸς γενόμενος μὴ τῷ βίῳ ζητεῖ τι τερπνὸν προσφέρειν, τὰ δ' ἄλλ' ἐᾷ, μάταιός ἐστιν ἔν γ' ἐμοὶ καὶ τοῖς σοφοῖς κριταῖς ἅπασιν ἐκ θεῶν τε δυστυχής

3 ἔν γ' ἐμοὶ Jacobs: εργεμοι A

Anyone who, being mortal, does not seek to add any enjoyment to life, and let everything else be, is a foolish both in my eyes and in the eyes of all the wise judges, and doomed by the gods

Ath. 8.336b-c καὶ ἄλλος δέ τίς φησι τῷ Σαρδαναπάλλῳ παραπλήσιος, ὑποτιθέμενος καὶ οὗτος τοῖς μὴ σωφρονοῦσι τοιάδε· … καὶ Ἄμφις δ' ὁ κωμῳδιοποιὸς ἐν Ἰαλέμῳ φησί· ὅστις — δυστυχής.

Another individual who resembles Sardanapallus, and who is likewise offering advice to individuals who are not of sound mind, says something like the following: (adesp. fr. 95, TrGF 2,43) … The comic poet Amphis as well says in "Ialemos": "Anyone — gods".

Metre Iambic trimeter

1. ——⏑— —|⏑⏑⏑— ——⏑— (penthemimeral caesura)
2. ——⏑— —|—⏑— ⏑—⏑— (penthemimeral caesura)
3. ⏑—⏑— ⏑|—⏑— ——⏑— (penthemimeral caesura)
4. ⏑—⏑— ⏑|—⏑— ⏑—⏑— (penthemimeral caesura)

Discussion Meineke 3,309f.; Bothe 484; Kock 2,242; Edmonds 320–323; PCG 2,222f.; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 300; Papachrysostomou 74–76

Citation Context The fragment is quoted by Athenaeus 8.336c, immediately after the quotation of a tragic fragment (adesp. fr. 95), which offers the same advice to mortals to enjoy life's ephemeral pleasures. The overall context within Athenaeus' text is a discussion about the pleasure-loving Assyrian king Ashurbanipal (Sardanapallus); see further comm. under "Citation Context" of Amphis fr. 8, which immediately follows the present fragment.

Constitution of Text The reading ἔν γ' ἐμοὶ is Jacobs' resourceful emendation (1809: 183) in replacement of the unintelligible εργεμοι preserved by codex A. This is one of many conspicuous cases that evince Arnott's belief (2000: 45) that John the Calligrapher (the scribe of codex A) had no pretensions to scholarship; in the present case he merely reproduced a meaningless array of letters.

Interpretation The speaker sounds like a champion of hedonism (cf. "Interpretation" for Amphis fr. 22). The fragment dwells on the subject of pleasure, as related to both mortality and the brevity of human life, and propagates a pleasure-seeking lifestyle. As such, the fragment is a typical example of a comic topos, i. e. the ideal of hedonism (ζῆν ἡδέως / carpe diem), of a luxurious and materialistic life. This topos is particularly elaborated during the periods of Middle and New Comedy; see e. g. Amphis fr. 8 (cf. "Interpretation" and comm. ad loc.), Alex. fr. 273 (cf. Arnott 1996: 762–764), Philetaer. frr. 7, 13 (see further below), 17 (cf. Papachrysostomou 2008: 224–227, 237–240, 242–247), Apollod.Car. fr. 5, etc. All these fragments communicate a universal call to mortals to indulge unrestrainedly in all sorts of pleasures (if identified, these pleasures are food, wine, and sex) during lifetime, for life on earth is short. These hedonistic fragments also share a stylistic feature, in that they belong in the distinctive comic trend of fake-philosophising, i. e. the pronounced tendency of comic characters towards generalisation in argument, which borders with the exercise of fake philosophy; see "Interpretation" for Amphis fr. 3 and Papachrysostomou (2012–2013a) 167–173. As stereotypically happens in the fragments belonging in this trend, the speaker of Amphis' present fragment speaks with maximum self-confidence, as if his words were sacrosanct and, therefore, undeniable. His words were most probably triggered by the play's current dramatic situation and/or specific episodes/events that had just taken place or were considered imminent; originating from the "here and now" the speaker's argumentation abruptly evolves into an extensive generalisation and a universal admonition about how mortals should pursue their lives. Regarding the essence of the particular "here-and-now" dramatic situation that incited the character's verbal reaction, certainty is understandably impossible, since we miss the fragment's original context. Yet, one possibility is that the speaker criticized certain aspects of Ialemos' temperament and lifestyle; one could easily imagine a frigid and detached Ialemos figure avoiding any kind of pleasure and standing on the sidelines of life. It is also possible that this fragment was delivered in a form of a programmatic statement quite early in the play (possibly by a prologue figure), before even the appearance of Ialemos himself, so that the audience might be aware of Ialemos and his behaviour. The possibilities are endless. The fragment concludes with an indirect metatheatrical comment (σοφοῖς κριταῖς); for another metatheatrical instance in Amphis, see fr. 17.4.

It is noteworthy that Amphis' present fragment displays a striking similarity – thematic and stylistic alike – with Philetaerus fr. 13 (also a hedonistic fragment from within the fake-philosophising trend); having won his first victory between 372 and 366 BC (IRDF 2325E.38), Philetaerus was a rough contemporary of Amphis. The explicit personal judgement, present in both Amphis (l. 3 ἔν γ' ἐμοὶ) and Philetaerus (l. 3 ἐγὼ … λέγω), is noteworthy:

θνητῶν δ' ὅσοι
ζῶσιν κακῶς ἔχοντες ἄφθονον βίον, ἐγὼ μὲν αὐτοὺς ἀθλίους εἶναι λέγω· οὐ γὰρ θανὼν δήπουθ' ἂν ἔγχελυν φάγοις, 5 οὐδ' ἐν νεκροῖσι πέττεται γαμήλιος

All those mortals who live miserably, although they have plentiful means of living,
I for one consider to be wretched;
for once you die, you can hardly eat eels,
5 nor is a bride-cake cooked among the dead

1 ὅστις] This ὅστις-clause serves to introduce a general statement deriving from a specific dramatic moment / situation in the play; it could be some preceding incident(s), forthcoming event(s), attested behaviour, temperament display, etc. It recurs four more times within the surviving corpus of Amphis: frr. 22, 26, 39, and 42; the speakers, pretending to be serious, make humorous and comic comments on various issues (see comm. on the fake-philosophising trend under "Interpretation"); cf. Antiph. fr. 261. This ὅστις-clause pattern occurs repeatedly in tragedy, mostly in Euripidean fragments, from where the influence upon the comic genre most probably originated; e. g. E. frr. 285.11, 425, 634, 852 (twice), 1028, 1063.9 (cf. comm. on μάταιος below); S. OC 1211, etc.

1–2 τῷ βίῳ … τερπνὸν προσφέρειν] Though the notion of adding (προσφέρειν) enjoyment/ delight/ pleasure (τερπνόν) to life (τῷ βίῳ) is hardly unparalleled in Middle and New Comedy (cf. "Interpretation" above), the phrasing is carefully chosen and unique in such a context.

3 μάταιος] When applied to a person (as it is here), the adjective μάταιος means foolish, empty, and the like (see LSJ[9] s. v.); cf. Ar. V. 338, Amips. fr. 9.1, etc. A rather conspicuous case that closely resembles Amphis' present fragment is E. fr. 1063.9–11, where μάταιος is used along with the ὅστις-clause pattern: ὅστις …/ σῴζει δάμαρτα, …/ μάταιός ἐστι καὶ φρονῶν οὐδὲν φρονεῖ (anyone who saves his wife … is foolish and, although he is capable of thinking, he thinks not).

3–4 ἔν … ἐμοὶ καὶ τοῖς … κριταῖς The preposition ἐν is typically used with a noun in the dative plural to express the notion of in the presence of; see LSJ[9] s. v. A.I.5b. However, in rare cases the dative singular can also be used (as here: ἐμοί), when a distinctive personal opinion/ judgement needs to be emphatically put forward; e. g. Ar. fr. 278, S. OC 1214, E. fr. 347.3, and (possibly) Hipp. 1320 (cf. Barrett 1978 ad loc.). See Wackernagel ([2]1926–1928) ii.243.

3–4 σοφοῖς/ κριταῖς ἅπασιν] The wise judges are probably all sensible people; anyone who could judge the situation and give their opinion on the matter if asked to. Yet, this reference can additionally afford a metatheatrical interpretation; i. e. the mention of the term κριτής within a theatrical context inevitably brings to mind the dramatic judges of the plays. The speaker may also accompany this reference with a gesture pointing towards them. The point of such a reference would be to dispose them positively towards both the play and the poet; cf. the address to the judges (consisting of promises and threats) in the parabasis of Aristophanes' Birds 1102–1117 (see Dunbar 1995: 576, 591–593); cf. Av. 445, Nu. 1115–1130 (see Dover 1968: 230), Ec. 1154–1162. See also Cratin. fr. 171.6, Eup. fr. 192.32, Pherecr. fr. 102. It is essential that in Amphis' fragment the judges are called wise (σοφοῖς), the implication being that they judge justly; this is a textbook case of captatio benevolentiae.

The judges of dramatic contests were ten in number, though the final verdict depended upon just five of them; cf. Epich. fr. 237 ἐν πέντε κριτᾶν γούνασι κεῖται (it's up to the judgement [lit. the lap] of five judges), Hsch. π 1408, etc. See Pickard-Cambridge ([3]1988) 95–99. It should not escape our attention that these remarks about the judges are references to the world outside the play's fictive situation, which (momentarily) interrupt the play's dramatic illusion. Such breaks of dramatic illusion are one of Comedy's defining attributes, which quintessentially distinguishes the comic from the tragic genre. The dramatic illusion (and, subsequently, the dramatic action) is discontinued primarily during the parabasis, secondly during the play's prologue and epilogue, and also intermittently throughout the play; through addressing the spectators, pointing to the theatre's structure, referring to the judges, etc. Naturally, most of the relevant evidence originates chiefly from the intact Aristophanic plays; any additional, sporadic, evidence resulting from fragments (from Middle and New Comedy) is invaluable for our understanding of the continuation of this phenomenon during the fourth century and beyond; e. g. Ar. fr. 403; Alex. fr. 113.1–2 (cf. Arnott 1996: 304); Men. Asp. 113, Mis. 464 (cf. Austin 1973 comm. ad loc.), etc. See further Stow 1936; Dover (1972) 59–65; Bain (1977) 98 n. 2, 185–207; Hubbard (1991) passim.

4a ἐκ θεῶν] The preposition ἐκ with the genitive as an expression of agent belongs to tragedy's – idiosyncratic – syntactical register; it is equivalent to the prose expression ὑπὸ θεῶν and is used by tragic poets (mostly Aeschylus and Euripides) to designate any events that emanate from gods' overpowering will; cf. e. g. A. Pers. 373, Th. 23, Ag. 1279, Cho. 1006; E. Med. 1284, Heracl. 587, Andr. 680, Ph. 1763, IA 1605; S. Ph. 1316; see Headlam (1891) 117, Smyth (1956) §§ 1678, 1688c. This is the only such instance within the surviving comic corpus.

4b ἐκ θεῶν τε δυστυχής This is the second time within the same play (cf. ἀναγκαίαν τύχην, fr. 20.6) that Amphis employs the language of divinely imposed destiny to speak about mundane matters. In tragedy the idea of gods governing the human lives is an omnipresent one (cf. e. g. Zimmermann 1991: 99–102; Mastronarde 2005, and 2010: 153–206; Rabinowitz 2008: 60–84; also the collection of essays edited by Cairns 2013); but here divine determinism is exploited comically. It is interesting that the same notion of gods condemning mortals who are hopeless in issues of pleasure recurs in Pl.Com. fr. 189.15 μή σοι νέμεσις θεόθεν καταπνεύσῃ (lest vengeance from the gods breathe down upon you), and also in quasi-similar language in Archestr. fr. 16.3–4 μή σοι νέμεσις καταπνεύσῃ / δεινὴ ἀπ' ἀθανάτων (lest terrible vengeance from the immortals breathe down upon you); both Plato's and Archestratus' fragments deal with fish (mishandling and failing to buy some, respectively) – on their common literary background see Olson & Sens (2000) xxviii-xxix.

However, gods judging a sombre lifestyle negatively is not a completely comic conception; Aphrodite's hostility towards Hippolytus in Euripides' homonymous play derives partly from his obsession with purity and abstention from sex; see further Barrett's introduction to the play (1978: 1–15); Blomqvist 1982; Segal (1993) 89–153; Roisman (1999) 27–46.

fr. 22 (22 K.)

ὅστις κορακῖνον ἐσθίει θαλάττιον γλαύκου παρόντος, οὗτος οὐκ ἔχει φρένας

Anyone who eats sea crow-fish, when there is some grey-fish available, has no brain

Ath. 7.309a
Ἄμφις δ' ἐν Ἰαλέμῳ· ὅστις — φρένας

And Amphis in "Ialemos": "Anyone — brain"

Metre Iambic trimeter

1. ——⏑⏑— ⏑|—⏑— ⏑—⏑— (penthemimeral caesura)
2. ——⏑— ⏑|—⏑— ⏑—⏑— (penthemimeral caesura)

Discussion Meineke 3,310; Bothe 484; Kock 2,242; Edmonds 2,322f.; PCG 2,223; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 300; Papachrysostomou 76–78

Citation Context The fragment is cited by Athenaeus 7.309a towards the conclusion of the section dealing with the fish species of κορακῖνος (7.308d-309b). The discussion on korakinos is part of an extensive discussion among the banqueters concerning numerous kinds of fish and seafood; cf. "Citation Context" for Amphis fr. 16.

Interpretation The speaker strongly presents his own gastronomic opinion and declares that he prefers the delicacy of glaukos (a kind of grey-fish; cf. comm. s. v. below) instead of some cheap crow-fish. This could be a way to add pleasure to everyday life, as fr. 21 urges (cf. comm. ad loc.). What is particularly arresting here is the conspicuous resemblance – both stylistic and thematic – between fr. 21 and fr. 22. In both fragments the speakers exhibit the same self-confidence, issue guidelines about the art of eating and living well, as if they were gurus, and there is an explicit air of undeniability in their words; in addition, there is the same exaggeration in judgement, since any mortal who fails to comply with the recommended lifestyle is considered foolish; cf. μάταιος (fr. 21.3) and οὐκ ἔχει φρένας (fr. 22.2). A reasonable, though unprovable, hypothesis is that the speaker in fr. 21 and fr. 22 is the same. Whatever the case, the assertive display of erudite knowledge on gastronomic issues is reminiscent of the figure of braggart cook (stereotypical in Middle and New Comedy; cf. e. g. Dionys.Com. frr. 2 and 3, Mnesim. fr. 4; with Papachrysostomou 2008: 155–182, 186–210; see also comm. on Amphis fr. 16.1c above), as well as of Archestratus' Hedypatheia; see Olson & Sens (2000) xxvi, lv-lxi.

1a ὅστις See comm. on Amphis fr. 21.1.

1b κορακῖνον The term κορακῖνος was used to designate more than one kind of fish of dark / blackish, crow-like colour (< κόραξ, crow); cf. Ath. 7.312a τῶν κορακίνων· πολλὰ γὰρ καὶ τούτων γένη (the crow-fish, of which there are numerous varieties). Thompson (1947) 122–125 discerns at least four different kinds of fish bearing this name. The present fragment implies that crow-fish enjoyed a low culinary reputation; this is confirmed by several other passages, e. g. Ar. Lys. 560, Anaxandr. frr. 28.1, 34.11 (cf. Millis 2001: 111), Alex. fr. 18 (cf. Arnott 1996: 103–104), Archestr. fr. 20.3 (cf. Olson & Sens 2000: 93). See Strömberg (1943) 70, 78, 114–115.

2a γλαύκου On this grey-coloured fish see comm. on Amphis fr. 16.1a.

2b οὐκ ἔχει φρένας A symptom of madness. The term φρήν is presently employed to designate the "mind as seat of the mental faculties"; cf. LSJ[9] s. v. 3. Choosing a cheap / humble food or drink item to either consume or buy, when alternatives of better quality are available and affordable, is a recurrent motif in Comedy that is meant to point out a person's foolishness, just as in the present fragment; cf. Amphis fr. 26.3 (μαίνεται), Axion. fr. 4.15–17, Eub. fr. 35 (anise and celery are said to be foolishly preferred to wheat-pase cakes), Eup. fr. 355 (quasi-proverbial description of such absurd behaviour: οἴνου παρόντος ὄξος ἠράσθη πιεῖν: whilst wine was available, he longed for some vinegar), etc.

Καλλιστώ (Kallistō)
("Callisto")

Discussion Meineke 3,320; Kock 2, 242, 249; Edmonds 2,322f.; PCG 2,223; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 300

Title This is a made-up play that is falsely attributed to Amphis. Aeschylus wrote a tragedy called Callisto (TrGF 3,216) and Alcaeus wrote a comic play bearing the same title (PCG 2,8f.; cf. Orth 2013: 78–80). But there is no positive evidence confirming that Amphis wrote a play entitled Callisto, despite the fact that he did deal with the myth of the Arcadian nymph Callisto somewhere in his work, as the ancient scholia and other testimonies quoted under Amphis fr. 46 confirm (cf. comm. ad loc.). No ancient source mentions such a play-title as one of Amphis' works and no fragments are anywhere attributed to this play. The universal trend of assigning a play entitled Kallistō to Amphis traces back to 1840, when Meineke in his edition of Fragmenta Comicorum Graecorum wrote: "probabile est fabulam, ex qua haec derivata sunt, Καλλιστὼ fuisse inscriptam, quo titulo etiam Alcaeus comediam docuit" (3,320; comm. on Amphis fr. 46). Despite having said that, Meineke himself does not acknowledge such a title as a valid one among his own edition of Amphis' plays and leaves it out from the sequence of the plays in both vol. 1,406 and vol. 3,310. Nonetheless, Meineke's authority along with some ancient scholia on Aratus and other testimonies (reproduced at PCG 2,234 under Amphis fr. 46, ubi vide; cf. Martin 1974: 90) sufficed for Kallistō to be acknowledged among modern scholars as one of Amphis' valid play-titles. Apart from Meineke, all editors mentioned under "Discussion" include this play-title within Amphis' corpus; yet Kassel-Austin, when discussing Alcaeus' homonymous play (PCG 2,8), seem hesitant: "scripsit … comoediam fortasse Amphis". Likewise, Orth notes (2013: 78), "vielleicht schrieb aber auch Amphis eine Καλλιστώ".

Callisto was an Arcadian nymph, daughter of king Lycaon, and devotee of Artemis. Having been seduced and impregnated by Zeus, she incurred Artemis' wrath and was eventually turned (by Zeus or Artemis or Hera) into a constellation, that of Ursa Maior, Great Bear (Μεγάλη Ἄρκτος, also known as Ἑλίκη – Helice, e. g. Arat. 37, A.R. 3.1195). The details of the myth vary enormously; cf. (in addition to the aforementioned ancient scholia) Apollod. 3.8.2; Hygin. Fab. 176–177, Astr. 2.1; Manil. 2.29, 3.359; Ovid Met. 2.409–514; Paus. 1.25.1, 8.3.6–7. We lack any evidence suggesting that Amphis dedicated an entire play to the adventures of Callisto. What the ancient scholia confirm is that he simply dealt with this myth at some point in his plays (cf. e. g. the way Aristophanes peripherally mentions the story of the crested lark, κορυδός, in Av. 472–475; cf. Dunbar 1995: 326). Nesselrath (1990: 234–235) demonstrates that Amphis experimented drastically with the traditional myth and gave it two, at least, unprecedented twists: Amphis was the first who (i) presented Zeus assuming the shape of Artemis when seducing Callisto and (ii) presented the tricked Callisto blaming Artemis, who subsequently punished her devotee by turning her into a bear. See Henrichs (1987) 254–267.

Amphis' resourcefulness comes as no surprise, since myth burlesque was the universal norm for Middle Comedy's treatment of mythical tradition in general; cf. Intro. 4 ("Themes & Motifs"). Yet, we do not need to assume that Amphis' experimentation with Callisto's myth took place within a play named after the Arcadian nymph, since there is no record of such a play; on the contrary, Amphis may have dealt with the myth in every single one of his plays and/or perhaps used it as a mythological paradigm; cf. how Knemon's soliloquy in Men. Dysc. 153ff. sets off with a reference to Perseus' myth, thus drawing on the sanction of mythological tradition (see Reinhardt 1974: 106–109).

The possibility that Alcaeus' Callisto referred not to the nymph but to a contemporary hetaira called Καλλίστιον (mentioned by Macho fr. 18.433) was put forward by Meineke (2,829), discussed and rejected by Breitenbach (1908: 156–157), and endorsed by Geissler (1925) 68.

Κονιατής (Koniatēs)
("The Plasterer")

Discussion Meineke 1,405 (n. 85), 406 (Κονιάτης); Kock 2,242 (Κονιατής); Edmonds 2,322f. (Κονιάτης); PCG 2,223 (Κονιατής); Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 301

All we have from this play is Pollux' testimony of the play-title:
Poll. 7.125
καὶ κονιάματα δ' ἂν εἴποις, καὶ τὸ ῥῆμα κονιᾶν, καὶ τὸν τοῦτο δρῶντα κονιατήν· Ἄμφιδος δὲ καὶ δρᾶμα Κονιατής
Then, you have "koniamata" ("stuccos"), the verb being "koniān" ("to plaster with stucco"), and the person who performs this job is called "koniatēs" ("plasterer"); and there is also a play by Amphis called "The Plasterer".

This is one of Amphis' five banausic play-titles (cf. Intro. 4) and one of his nine shared ones with Alexis (cf. Intro. 8). No fragments survive from Amphis' play. The one surviving fragment from Alexis' play (fr. 111: an asyndetic list of four wine-vessels) is not instructive in any way. The Roman writer of mimes Laberius (first century BC) also wrote a Colorator (cf. Panayotakis' edition of 2010).

The title designates the plasterer / whitewasher, though editors appear divided regarding its accentuation; i. e. whether Κονιατής or Κονιάτης is the correct reading. Meineke and Edmonds adopt the paroxytone version, whereas Kock and Kassel-Austin adopt the oxytone one (see "Discussion" above). Manuscript tradition displays a preference for the oxytone version (Ath. 11.500e, Poll. 7.125, Hsch. and Sud. s. v. κονιαταί, sch. on Ar. Av. 1150), with only scarce occurrences of the paroxytone type (codex A at Ath. 11.500e, and Gal. 19.98). Yet, LSJ[9] record only the paroxytone κονιάτης, which they interpret – among others – as "title of play by Amphis". The issue is fairly complicated, since the scholars (like Meineke and Edmonds), who adopt the paroxytone version for Amphis' play-title, assume the same accentuation for the primary source that preserves the relevant testimony about Amphis, i. e. Pollux 7.125.

I consider the oxytone Κονιατής to be the correct accentuation of the term. Apart from the fact that this is by far the most preferred accentuation within the manuscript tradition, the noun κονιατης derives from the contract verb κονιάω (plaster with stucco); hence, it should be an oxytone (κονιατής), by analogy to numerous other nouns deriving from simplex contract verbs, cf. e. g. θεατής (< θεάομαι), ἀκροατής (< ακροάομαι), ἐραστής (< ἐράω), πορθητής (< πορθέω), ποιέω (< ποιητής), ὀρχηστής (< ὀρχέομαι), πειραστής (< πειράω), etc. Cf. Herodian's remark (Pros.Cath. 3.1,75.27 GG): τὸ δὲ θεατής καὶ πειρατής ῥηματικὰ ὄντα ὀξύνεται ("theatēs" and "peiratēs" are oxytones, since they derive from verbs).

Κουρίς (Kouris)
("The Maid-in-Waiting")

Date after the year 350 BC (so Nesselrath 1990: 197), etc.

Discussion Meineke 1,406; Kock 2,62f. (2,242); PCG 2,223; Papachrysostomou 78

Title This is one of Amphis' five banausic play-titles and one of his nine shared ones with Alexis (see Arnott 1996: 297–300, and Intro. 8). Antiphanes also wrote a play entitled Κουρίς (PCG 2,379f.), and Naevius wrote a Commotria.

Amphis' present play is one of the few valuable pieces of evidence that we have (the others being the references to Plato in Amphicratēs and Dexidēmidēs; cf. comm. ad loc.), which serve as useful chronological clues towards dating Amphis' career (see Intro. 2 "Chronology / Career", and Intro. 5 "Kōmōdoumenoi"). Four historic hetairai that we know to have been active in fourth century Athens are mentioned by name in this play's surviving fragments: Sinope, Lyca, and Nannion feature in fr. 23, and Phryne in fr. 24. On the basis of the reference to these hetairai, Nesselrath (1990: 197) dates the play some time after the year 350 BC, Webster (1952: 21) opts for the early 340s, whereas Schiassi (1951: 231, 234) suggests the years between 345 and 340 BC as the play's production date. Nevertheless, we should remain cautious, since references to the age of hetairai can be exaggerated for comic purposes and, therefore, they are not always the safest criterion to date a comic play. Content-wise, it is noteworthy that both surviving fragments from this play refer to the wealth of some famous hetairai (see further comm. under individual fragments).

It is essential to note that the meaning of the term κουρίς underwent a crucial shift before Amphis' production of the present play. Originally, the term κουρίς designated τὸ ἐργαλεῖον τοῦ κουρέως (Hdn. Pros.Cath. 3.1,99.11 GG; cf. Poll. 10.140), i. e. the shear; as in e. g. Cratin. fr. 39. At that same time, the term κομμώτρια designated the maid-in-waiting, the tirewoman; as in e. g. Ar. Ec. 737. However, various sources (lexicographical and other) either implicitly suggest or explicitly confirm that during the first half of the fourth century BC the term κουρίς gradually took over the meaning of κομμώτρια and thenceforth designated the maid-in-waiting (though the initial meaning of κουρίς was not forgotten; see Poll. 10.140); cf. Phot. Bibl. 530a τὰς νῦν λεγομένας κουρίδας οἱ Ἀττικοὶ κομμωτρίας ἐκάλουν (the Attic writers used to call "kommōtria" those whom we now call "kouris"), Poll. 2.32; see Arnott (1996) 297 for an exhaustive list of relevant evidence. This maid-in-waiting (now called κουρίς) was understandably in charge of every aspect of beautifying her mistress, including hairdressing, a job that with time the maids-in-waiting probably started pursuing independently as well (cf. Arnott 1996: 297); hence, the term κουρίς ended up designating (almost exclusively) the female hairdresser. Thus, Pollux naturally explains κουρίς as the female of κουρεύς (7.165), and also the scholiast on Ar. Ec. 737 glosses κομμώτρια as ἐμπλέκτρια, ἡ κοσμοῦσα τὰς γυναῖκας – ἣν καλοῦμεν νῦν κουρίδα (kommōtria: the maid in charge of hair-plaiting and embellishing women – the one whom we now call "kouris").

By the time that Amphis, Antiphanes, and Alexis wrote their Κουρίς-plays this shift in meaning had already been implemented; i. e. κουρίς was commonly used instead of κομμώτρια to designate the maid-in-waiting.[13] In fact, the usage of κουρίς in Comedy is the earliest attested with the new meaning; Alexis' play probably came third (on his floruit see Arnott 1996: 3–18), but it is hard to determine precedence between Amphis' and Antiphanes' plays (on the latter's floruit see Konstantakos 2000b). Yet, in any case, this was a relatively recent change (NB that κομμώτρια is still used by Aristophanes in Ec. 737, ca. 392/1 BC, to designate the maid-in-waiting); therefore, it would be fairly precarious to assume that the term κουρίς had additionally already acquired the narrower sense of hairdresser. Even some hundred years later Polybius (15.25.32) employs κουρίς with the broad sense of maid-in-waiting. Thus, I believe it is wiser to translate Amphis' play-title as The Maid-in-Waiting.

The role of the title figure within Amphis' play cannot be determined. An intriguing plot reconstruction – though, admittedly, just one of several possibilities – would be to assume that this was a recognition play and hence a forerunner of New Comedy, and that the title figure was eventually found to be a citizen (for this type of plot in New Comedy see Hunter 1985:

[13] The counterargument, i. e. that the three playwrights might still use κουρίς to mean shear, is not tenable for several reasons. Apart from the strong dating clues provided by our sources, it would be absurd to assume that three playwrights wrote plays entitled The Shear (and also managed to build an interesting plot out of it), plus this would be an unparalleled type of comic title (we have no evidence of plays featuring tools of any kind in their titles). On the contrary, the Maid-in-Waiting is in perfect alignment with two trends of Middle (and New) Comedy: (i) of banausic play-titles (cf. Amphis' Anointress, Vinedresser, Day-Labourers, Plasterer; Antiphanes' Gardener; Alexis' Herdsmen; Eubulus' Maid of the Mill; etc.), and (ii) of play-titles featuring a female figure: see examples of female ethnics under n. 15; cf. the multiple Heiress-plays (Ἐπίκληρος) by Antiphanes, Heniochus, Alexis, Menander, Diphilus, and Diodorus, as well as Alexis' intriguing play-title The Girl who went into the well (Ἡ εἰς τὸ φρέαρ).

130–136, and Webster [2]1970: 74–82). Regarding Alexis' Kouris, Arnott (1996: 298) attempts a parallelism with Plautus' Truculentus, where a tonstrix acts as a go-between (ll. 389ff.). In the absence of any affirmative evidence, certainty is impossible.

fr. 23 (23 K.)

τυφλὸς ὁ Πλοῦτος εἶναί μοι δοκεῖ, ὅστις γε παρὰ ταύτην μὲν οὐκ εἰσέρχεται, παρὰ δὲ Σινώπῃ καὶ Λύκᾳ καὶ Ναννίῳ ἑτέραις τε τοιαύταισι παγίσι τοῦ βίου
5 ἔνδον κάθητ' ἀπόπληκτος οὐδ' ἐξέρχεται

1 post τυφλὸς interpunxit et τυφλὸς δ' addidit Bothe 2 γε – εἰσέρχ. om. CE 3 δὲ om. CE 4 ἑτέραις Mus.: ἑταί- ACE

I think Plutos is blind, for he does not enter the house of this girl,
but in the homes of Sinope, Lyca, and Nannion, and other similar traps of life,
5 he sits senseless inside and never comes out

Ath. 13.567f-568a
τούτων τῶν ἑταιρῶν καὶ Ἄμφις μνημονεύει ἐν Κουρίδι λέγων (Ἄ. δε που φησί CE)· τυφλὸς —— ἐξέρχεται

Amphis also mentions these hetairai in "The Maid-in-Waiting", saying: "I think —— out"

Metre Iambic trimeter

1. – ⏑⏑–⏑|– ––⏑– (hephthemimeral caesura)
2. ––⏑⏑⏑ ––⏑|– ––⏑– (hephthemimeral caesura)
3. ⏑⏑⏑⏑– –|–⏑– ––⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
4. ⏑⏑–⏑– ––⏑|⏑⏑ ⏑–⏑– (hephthemimeral caesura)
5. ––⏑– ⏑⏑–⏑|– ––⏑– (hephthemimeral caesura)

Discussion Meineke 3,310; Bothe 484; Kock 2,242f.; Edmonds 2,322f.; PCG 2,224; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 301; Papachrysostomou 78–81

Citation Context The present fragment is cited by Athenaeus, Book 13 – and this says it all. Book 13 is the only Book of Deipnosophistae that bears a title: Περὶ γυναικῶν (On Women), though this title is partially misleading since Book 13 focuses on a specific group of women, the hetairai. Some one hundred and fifty historical hetairai (dating from the fifth to the third centuries BC) are mentioned in this Book (cf. McClure 2003: 183–197), which is an extensive treatment of hetairai and an invaluable reservoir of fragments and quotations about them mainly from (Middle and New) Comedy, but also from other genres, such as oratory and historiography. See further McClure (2003) 1–58.

Amphis' present fragment is quoted by the banqueter Cynulcus and forms part of his fierce invective against hetairai (13.565–571a), and especially against the high-priced or big-fee ones, the μεγαλόμισθοι; see McClure (2003) 47–51.

Constitution of Text The Epitome codices C and E leave out the play's title (see Arnott 2000 and Intro. 3 "Tradition & Reception"). Since l. 1 lacks the first three elements of the first iambic metre (cf. "Metre" above), Bothe attempted to fill in the lacuna by inserting the words "τυφλὸς δ' ", preceded by a comma, after the reading τυφλός that already exists in the text, so that the line would read: τυφλός, τυφλὸς δ' ὁ Πλοῦτος εἶναί μοι δοκεῖ. In this case, the line scans correctly in full; stylistically, the speaker would be making an emotional repetition of the word τυφλός, which some scribe left out through haplography. Admittedly, this would be a resourceful cure for the lacuna; I refrain though from adopting it since (i) the meaning of the fragment is complete as it stands, and (ii) what survives of line 1 scans correctly; hence it is not necessary to modify the manuscript tradition in any way.

Regarding lines 2 and 3, the selective omissions of codices C and E reveal (i) the scribes' painstaking concern to epitomize Athenaeus' work by leaving out as much information deemed superfluous as possible (in l. 2 the information that Wealth does not visit an unnamed female figure is deemed immaterial, compared to the three notorious figures to which Wealth does pay a visit in l. 3), and (ii) the scribes' erudition; after omitting most of l. 2, including μέν, they also omit δέ from l. 3; despite rendering the line unmetrical, through the omission of δέ, they manage to maintain (or rather, to restore) the text's notional integrity.

In l. 4 the manuscript tradition unanimously preserves the unmetrical ἑταίραις (hetairai; dat. pl.), which Musurus aptly corrected to ἑτέραις (other; dat. pl.). It is easy to understand how the mistake occurred; having successively copied the names of three famous hetairai in the previous line, the scribe is instinctively prompted to write ἑταίραις (perhaps even thinking he was correcting a mistake). Musurus' learned correction remedies both the metre and the meaning.

Interpretation The speaker visualises the personified and blind Plutos being permanently settled in the houses of three well-known hetairai (thus making them rich), but refraining from paying a visit to some other female figure that remains unnamed. The speaker thinks very little of the three hetairai and assimilates them to traps of life; he also disapproves of Plutos' preferential treatment of them.

This fragment stands out within Amphis' surviving corpus, for it displays by far the most direct, immediate, and straightforward relation to the contemporary reality of fourth century Athens: the comic character mentions by name three highly renowned hetairai, who were alive at the time of the play's performance: Sinope, Lyca, and Nannion (see further comm. under each name below). In addition, the assimilation of these hetairai to traps (παγίσι, l. 4) is part of a comic topos in Middle and New Comedy (but cf. also Ar. fr. 869), i. e. hetairai are often described in terms of hunting imagery and are typically paralleled to huntresses and / or rapacious monsters; cf. Theophil. fr. 11 where the hetairai appear to possess nets (λίνα) into which their victims fall (ἐμπεσεῖν) and subsequently become entangled (ἐμπλέκουσι), with the assistance of pimps (μαστροποί); cf. Papachrysostomou 2008: 272–276. Philetaerus' play Κυναγίς (The Huntress) may have also featured a hetaira hunting men as its central character (cf. Papachrysostomou 2008: 221).

This conception of hetairai as dangerous huntresses is directly related with the conspicuous reference to Plutos in the present fragment. Of course, the possibility of the personified god of Wealth appearing on stage as a speaking character cannot be entirely ruled out (in this case Amphis' play would feature a fantasy mix of human and divine elements, and Aristophanes' Wealth would be an obvious antecedent). Nonetheless, in the absence of any concrete evidence favouring a stage appearance of Plutos, it is wiser to assume that the speaker's reference to Plutos was nothing more than a circumstantial comment about wealth, triggered from and directly related to the reference to the three hetairai in l. 3.

Both the correlation between Plutos and hetairai and the detail that he sits inside (ἔνδον κάθηται, l. 5) their houses are fairly instructive and should be examined against the whole canvas of Middle and New Comedy, and in close relation to the aforementioned hunting imagery concerning hetairai. The comic playwrights of fourth century and beyond often complain about the preposterously high prices charged by hetairai (though understandably not by the cheap and anonymous ones residing at brothels; cf. Xenarch. fr. 4, Eub. fr. 67), and they repeatedly engage in an extremely sharp, almost hostile, satire against them and their riches (for a similarly caustic satire against fishmongers see "Interpretation" for Amphis fr. 30); e. g. in Timocl. fr. 16 the hetaira Pythionice is characterised ἄπληστος (insatiable); in Timocl. fr. 25 Phryne – despite her previous destitution (we are told that "she used to gather capers") – is picky with her clients now that she has amassed riches; in Epicr. fr. 3 Lais is said to be driven wild by money (l. 12: ὑπὸ τῶν στατήρων ἦν ἀπηγριωμένη); in Aristopho fr. 4 the speaker complains that the houses of hetairai, as if they were taboo places (διοπετεῖς), have become unapproachable (ἄβατοι) to the less affluent (cf. Papachrysostomou 2008: 102–103). It would not be a hyperbole to say even that the comic playwrights often communicate bitter feelings of resentment and indignation towards hetairai. The monstrous hetaira, who is hunting for both clients and money, becomes a stereotypical figure in Middle and New Comedy and a regular recipient of Comedy's multiple attacks. A noticeable example is Anaxil. fr. 22 where the speaker likens Nannion to mythical Scylla and Phryne to monstrous Charybdis, and then describes how they both drown (financially, that is) their clients (cf. further comm. under individual hetairai below). It is telling that the comic character uses the verb θηρεύεται (l. 16; she hunts) to describe Nannion's zealous pursuing of a partner. In an impressive tour de force Anaxilas' character concludes that, no matter how many wild beasts there are, hetairai are the most dangerous and the most destructive (ἐξωλέστερον) species of them all (ll. 30–31: οὐδὲ ἓν / ἐσθ' ἑταίρας ὅσα περ ἔστι θηρί' ἐξωλέστερον). Likewise, in Philippid. fr. 5 the hetaira Gnathaina is described as ἀνδροφόνος (murderer of men). The portrayal of hetairai as being rapacious renders less paradoxical the idea (put forward in Amphis fr. 1.4, ubi vide) that they, and not their lovers, are the ones who literally fight to get a partner.

Amphis' present fragment features, in a way of an epitome, the two defining attributes of Comedy's stereotypical representation of hetairai; their insatiable appetite for money and their hunting skill at pursuing clients. The identity of the speaker is insignificant and beyond recovery.

Metre The three first elements of the first metre are missing; cf. "Constitution of Text".

1 τυφλὸς ὁ Πλοῦτος The speaker draws on the widespread literary tradition about Plutos' blindness. Generally, Plutos is thought to be blind, because he favours randomly good and bad people alike. The conception of Plutos' blindness traces back at least to Hippon. fr. 36, where the blind Plutos is said to have visited the poet's house, but he never granted him wealth:

> ἐμοὶ δὲ Πλοῦτος – ἔστι γὰρ λίην τυφλός –
> ἐς τὠικί' ἐλθὼν οὐδάμ' εἶπεν "Ἱππῶναξ, > δίδωμί τοι μνέας ἀργύρου τριήκοντα > καὶ πόλλ' ἔτ' ἄλλα"· δείλαιος γὰρ τὰς φρένας

Plutos – for he is totally blind – having come to my house, never said "Hipponax,
I give you thirty silver minae, plus many more" – for he has a wretched mind

In Aristophanes' Wealth the whole plot is built upon this visualisation (cf. Newiger 1957: 165–177), and we are also told that Plutos' blindness was inflicted by Zeus because of his ill-will towards mankind (l. 87); cf. van Leeuwen (1904) 6–7. For a list of references to Plutos' blindness see Diggle (1970) 132–133.

2a ὅστις γε … οὐκ εἰσέρχεται A relative clause of cause; cf. Smyth (1956) §2555. The particle γε, usually present in such clauses, serves to reinforce the causal meaning of the relative pronoun (ὅστις), and subsequently of the whole sentence. For the metaphor, which maintains the personification of Plutos (εἰσέρχεται), see E. Ph. 532–534 where the personified and deified Φιλοτιμία (Ambition) enters and leaves peoples' homes and cities (to their ruin).

2b ταύτην The referent of this demonstrative pronoun remains unnamed and unidentifiable; it could be either the title-figure of the Maid-in-Waiting or any other female character. The only information that we have regarding her status is that the speaker juxtaposes her with the three famous hetairai; he wishes that Plutos visited her instead and considers her worthy of becoming rich. It does not necessarily follow that this unnamed maid is not a hetaira too; she might be a hetaira with a golden heart, similar to the one eulogised in Antiph. fr. 210 (ἠθός τι χρυσοῦν, l. 5), or to the lyre-girl described in Theophil. fr. 12 (cf. Papachrysostomou 2008: 276–281), or else to the hetaira Chrysis in Menander's Samia. See Keuls (1985) 187–203.

3a Σινώπῃ Sinope was a famous hetaira, active in Athens during the second (and also the early third) quarter of the fourth century BC (PAA 823225). She originated not from the town of Sinope (on the south of Black Sea; cf. Bechtel 1902: 59–60), but from Thrace; from there she moved to Athens, after passing from the island of Aegina (Theopomp. FGrH 115 F 253). Demosthenes' reference to Sinope in 22.56 (Against Androtion; 355 BC) serves as a major dating clue for her career; she was probably born around 380 BC (cf. Schiassi 1951: 232–234; Coppola 1927: 459). When Amphis' play was produced, between 350 and 340 BC (relevant discussion above), Sinope must have been fairly old (and perhaps her old age served as a comic target). She could still practise her profession or she could have retired; in either case, she was unquestionably rich, since Plutos is visualised to have settled in her house. The following witticism, preserved by Herodicus the Cratetan (ap. Ath. 13.586a), reveals Sinope's longevity: Ἄβυδος ἐλέγετο διὰ τὸ γραῦς εἶναι (she was nicknamed Abydos for being an old woman); Abydos (a colony of Miletus, on the Asian side of Hellespont) was regarded as a timeworn city, and its inhabitants had a reputation for being licentious and depraved (Ath. 12.524f: ἀνειμένοι τὴν δίαιταν καὶ κατεαγότες). Sinope's longevity is confirmed in Comedy, e. g. Anaxil. fr. 22.12–13 (where she is explicitly described as a sexually active γραῦς), Antiph. fr. 27.12 (cf. Konstantakos 2000a: 81–83). Athenaeus 13.586a reports that she was also mentioned elsewhere in Comedy, though – unfortunately – without quoting the actual fragments; e. g. Alex. fr. 109 (cf. Arnott 1996: 293–294); Antiph. frr. 23, 43, 114, 168; Callicr. fr. 1. Sinope's excessively indecent behaviour became proverbial and gave rise to the verb σινωπίζω (behave like Sinope); Hsch. s. v. σινωπίσαι: τοῦτο πεποίηται παρὰ τὴν ἑταίραν Σινώπην. ἐκωμῳδεῖτο γὰρ ἐπὶ τῷ ἀσχημονεῖν (σινωπίσαι: this is made out of the hetaira Sinope; for she was satirized on account of her indecorous behaviour); cf. Sud. s. v. Σινώπη, and Phot. s. v. σινωπίσαι.

The motif of old (but possibly still active) hetairai is found elsewhere; e. g. Ar. fr. 148.1, Philetaer. fr. 9, Timocl. fr. 27, Xenarch. fr. 4.9, Philet. AP 6.210. It is difficult to know how literally to take this motif. It may be true that many hetairai had long-running careers and continued to practise their profession beyond their prime (however we determine that), but, since Comedy by and large tends towards exaggeration, it may be this (rather than the precise arithmetic of years) which makes the comic poets present the hetairai as old. See Hunter (1983) 152–153.

3b Λύκᾳ … Ναννίῳ Lyca (PAA 610040) and Nannion (PAA 700568) were famous hetairai (the latter much more so), who plied their trade in Athens around, roughly, the mid-fourth century BC. Their precise floruit and time span of their career are not easy to establish, but Timocl. fr. 27 (from the play Orestautokleides), where Lyca and Nannion are mentioned together, is fairly instructive, since the speaker describes both hetairai as γρᾶες (old women). It is significant that the hetaira Phryne (featuring in Amphis fr. 24) is also mentioned in the same company of these old women in Timocl. fr. 27. Hunter (1979: 34) dates Timocles' Orestautokleides to the 330s or 320s, though both Breitenbach (1908: 33–36) and Schiassi (1951: 230–231) date it earlier, towards the mid to late 350s. This latter date for Orestautokleides roughly coincides with the suggested date for Amphis' Kouris (relevant discussion above); hence, if in Timocles' play Lyca and Nannion were old enough to be called γρᾶες, they would probably be considered and pictured as γρᾶες in Amphis' play as well. Aging hetairai constituted a favourite target for comic playwrights; and Sinope was known for her longevity (cf. comm. s. v. Σινώπῃ). Hence, this ensemble of three aged / aging hetairai probably offered Amphis some ideal material for weaving his plot. The fact that the speaker in Amphis' present fragment does not comment on the (old) age of these three hetairai should not hold back our interpretation; such a reference may have simply not survived, and we should also not forget that Plutos is visualised as being blind, and therefore unable to detect the ugliness of the aging hetairai that he favours with his presence. In fact, Plutos' frequenting ugly hags (instead of e. g. a younger female character, ταύτην, l. 2) may constitute yet another reason why the speaker sounds so disapproving of the god's behaviour (i. e. in addition to the trap/hunting imagery associated with hetairai; cf. comm. s. v. παγίσι).

The only surviving evidence regarding the hetaira Lyca is Amphis' present fragment and Timocl. fr. 27. On the contrary, Nannion's presence is much more prominent in our sources (comic and other); she even features as a title figure in a comic play by Eubulus (PCG 5,227f.); see Hunter (1983) 152–153. Regarding the formation of her name see Lambin 1984. The most striking piece of comic evidence about Nannion is perhaps Anaxil. fr. 22.15–17, where Nannion is assimilated to the mythical monster Scylla and is visualised hunting down her victims and drowning them (as a metaphor for the financial wreckage that she causes to her clients): ἡ δὲ Νάννιον τί νυνὶ διαφέρειν Σκύλλης δοκεῖ;/ οὐ δύ' ἀποπνίξασ' ἑταίρους τὸν τρίτον θηρεύεται/ἔτι λαβεῖν; (what difference can you see today between Nannion and Scylla? after she strangled two boyfriends, isn't she angling now to catch a third?); on the kind of imagery evoked see "Interpretation" above.

It is noteworthy how contemporary orators employ the names and activities of famous hetairai within their speeches to advance their arguments or otherwise to serve their ultimate goals; hetairai can even feature in the title of a speech, e. g. [Demosthenes'] Κατὰ Νεαίρας, Hyperides' Ὑπὲρ Φρύνης. As already mentioned above, Sinope is mentioned by Demosthenes (22.56); Nannion is mentioned by Hyperides (Against Patroclus, fr. 142 J.), and so is Phryne (cf. comm. below on Amphis fr. 24). For the multifarious relation of oratory with the socio-economic phenomenon of hetairai see Glazebrook 2001 and 2006.

4 παγίσι This term (παγίς meaning trap, snare) is – along with Plutos' presence – the key word for the interpretation of this fragment. The speaker disparages hetairai and parallels them to traps of life. This metaphor lands the whole fragment in the midst of a comic topos, i. e. the hunting imagery commonly associated with hetairai in Middle and New Comedy; cf. especially the nets of hetairai in Theophil. fr. 11.4. See further "Interpretation" above. It is telling that in Luc. DMeretr 11.2 Παγίς stands as a nickname for a hetaira. Still, the first comic occurrence of the word παγίς in relation with women (though not describing them directly) occurs already in Aristophanes fr. 869 (preserved and interpreted by Phrynichus PS 30.3): "αἱ τῶν γυναικῶν παγίδες": τοὺς κόσμους καὶ τὰς ἐσθῆτας, αἷς χρῶνται αἱ γυναῖκες καλλωπιζόμεναι, παγίδας εἶπεν Ἀριστοφάνης ("traps of women": the ornaments and clothes that women use to beautify themselves, Aristophanes called them "traps"). For further parallels (mainly Latin) see Marx (1904–1905) ii.321.

5a ἔνδον κάθητ' Plutos is visualised as sitting dumbfounded in the houses of Sinope, Lyca, and Nannion. The usage of κάθηται highlights and contrasts his permanent residence in the home of these undeserving hetairai with his failure to visit the deserving female character (ταύτην). The verb κάθημαι is often used in a negative sense, to connote inactivity, idleness; see LSJ[9] s. v. 3 with examples.

There is a paradox here that stands against the expectations of the audience, since it is Poverty (Πενία), not Plutos, the character that traditionally figures in literature as an inhabitant in people's houses. This visualisation of Poverty is as old as Thgn. 351. It recurs in Ar. Pl. 437, Pl. Smp. 203d, Porph. Abst. 3.27, etc. Cf. comm. on Amphis fr. 17.3a.

5b ἀπόπληκτος This adjective is a medical term that designates the patient that has been disabled / paralysed, usually by a stroke; e. g. Hp. Prorrh. 2.19, Flat. 13, Aph. 6.57; Ruf. Quest.Med. 10, etc., cf. LSJ[9] s. v. The comic character employs this medical metaphor, in order to visualise Plutos as astounded, speechless, and utterly flabbergasted, as if he was left paralysed by a stroke. Before Amphis the adjective ἀπόπληκτος had been already used with the same metaphorical sense in Pl.Com. fr. 138; cf. Ar. V. 948.

The reason for Plutos' astonishment seems to be the beauty of hetairai. But, if so, this creates some kind of paradox, since Plutos' visual amazement is incompatible with his blindness. I see two plausible explanations here: (i) Plutos' blindness was not meant literally by the speaker in l. 1, but only as a stylistic device and a desperate attempt on his behalf to explain Plutos' favouring the hetairai; the syntactic structure favours this interpretation: i. e. the speaker does not say "the blind Plutos…" or "Plutos is blind…", but rather "it appears to me (μοι δοκεῖ) that Plutos is blind…", that is "he must be blind…". (ii) Plutos does not necessarily need his vision to apprehend the charms of hetairai, who are in fact so potent that they can mesmerize even a blind person with their captivating and irresistible allure. Both explanations are possible (without, necessarily, being mutually exclusive).

fr. 24 (24 K.)

Ath. 13.591d
εἴρηκεν δὲ περὶ τοῦ πλούτου αὐτῆς (Φρύνης) Τιμοκλῆς ὁ κωμικὸς ἐν Νεαίρᾳ … καὶ Ἄμφις ἐν Κουρίδι.

Regarding her (Phryne's) wealth, Timocles the comic playwright has talked about it in "Neaira" (fr. 25, ap. Ath. 13.567e) … and so has Amphis in "The Maid-in-Waiting".

Discussion Meineke 3,310; Bothe 484; Kock 2,243; Edmonds 2,322f.; PCG 2,224; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 301

Citation Context This is a piece of evidence in prose; i. e. not an actual quotation of Amphis' own words. It is preserved by Athenaeus, in Book 13 (on which see comm. in "Citation Context" for Amphis fr. 23), 591d, within a discussion about the famous hetaira Phryne, as part of the miscellaneous evidence (comic and other) about her that Athenaeus has gathered and, fortunately, preserved. The section 13.590d-591f is entirely dedicated to Phryne, though scattered evidence about her is also to be found elsewhere within Book 13, e. g. 558c, 567e, 585e-f, 588c.

Interpretation Amphis' fragment dealt – in some now irrecoverable way – with the wealth of the famous hetaira Phryne, and, thus, it directly relates with the widespread comic trend discussed under "Interpretation" of fr. 23 above, i. e. Comedy's frequent and vehement attack (during the fourth century and beyond) against the big-fee (μεγαλόμισθοι) hetairai, on account of the high prices they used to charge.

Phryne (PAA 964975) was one of the most renowned and most beautiful hetairai of the ancient world. Most surviving evidence about her is preserved by Athenaeus, Book 13 (see "Citation Context"). Phryne was born ca. 371 BC in the Boeotian town of Thespiae and pursued her career in Athens. Her true name, Mnēsaretē was soon forgotten and was replaced by the nickname Phryne (φρύνη = toad), alluding to her pale complexion. A most revealing anecdote of her incomparable beauty is preserved by Gal. Protr. 10.43–52: when during a symposion challenge all hetairai removed their make-up, everyone looked hideous apart from Phryne, whose natural beauty glared even more. Phryne was believed to have posed as a model for Praxiteles' Aphrodite of Cnidus, as well as for Apelles' Aphrodite Rising from the Sea (Ath. 13.591a; though cf. Ridgway 1987: 406); on her captivating beauty see further Plu. 849e, Luc. Cat. 22, Alciphr. 4.5.2, etc. Despite her initial destitution (cf. Timocles' portrayal of her gathering capers in fr. 25), Phryne managed to acquire considerable property and become overwhelmingly rich. In her witty reply to an aspiring lover (Macho fr. 18.450–455) Phryne names the astronomical price of one mina (one hundred drachmas) for a night and tells the poor fellow that, failing to pay the price, he would need to wait until she, not him, felt like having sex (ἕως ἂν οὗ βινητιάσω). In her notorious impiety trial soon after 350 BC (still remembered by Posidipp. fr. 13, roughly a century later), Phryne was defended by Hyperides (Ὑπὲρ Φρύνης, fr. 171 J.), probably one of her lovers at the time, who dramatically undressed her in front of the jurors, thus securing her acquittal, in a scene reproduced in a painting several centuries later, in 1861 by Jean-Léon Gérôme ("Phryné devant l'Aréopage"); for the association of hetairai with the genre of oratory see comm. on fr. 23.3b. Phryne outlived the rebuilding of Theban walls in 316 BC; her legendary offer to finance the fortifications, preserved by Callistratus (FGrH 348 F 1), is revealing of her huge fortune. See further McClure (2003) 126–136, 191–192.

Regarding the present case, the information we get from Athenaeus is merely that Amphis has talked about (εἴρηκεν περί) Phryne's wealth. Given the rest of the surviving (and aforementioned, cf. fr. 23) comic evidence on hetairai (including Phryne) in relation to money, one can safely presume that Amphis' current reference was, at best, satirical – if not hostile, as is Anaxilas', in fr. 22.18–19, where Phryne is assimilated to the mythical monster Charybdis and is visualised grabbing a ship-owner and gulping him down, along with his boat (τόν τε ναύκληρον λαβοῦσα καταπέπωκ' αὐτῷ σκάφει); a graphic metaphor that was meant to highlight Phryne's insatiability and ruthlessness.

It is intriguing that both fr. 23 and fr. 24 deal with hetairai and money. It is reasonable and also tempting to assume (and Meineke was the first who did so) that these two fragments originate from the same section of Amphis' play and were close to one another. All four hetairai mentioned in fr. 23 and fr. 24, i. e. Sinope, Lyca, Nannion, and Phryne, were roughly contemporary and were considered old and past their prime at the time of the play's performance (see comm. under individual hetairai, Amphis fr. 23). It is conceivable that Amphis used this quartet of high-priced and (once) much desired, though now fairly old but significantly rich hetairai, to make a substantial point / argument, or even an entire scene within his play. Though unprovable, it is rather improbable that the unnamed female figure (ταύτην) of fr. 23 was Phryne, who – given her unrivalled beauty – remained desirable (and more deserving of Plutos' visit) even when she grew old.

Whatever the case, fr. 23 and fr. 24 most probably belonged in the same thematic unit (of unknown length) on hetairai and money within Amphis' present play. Whether this unit was central or simply peripheral to the play's main theme (whatever this was) and whether it was related in any way to the title-figure, it is now beyond recovery.

Κυβευταί (Kubeutai)
("The Dice-Players")

Discussion Meineke 3,310f.; Bothe 484; Edmonds 2,322f.; PCG 2,224; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 302

Title The theme of gambling was fairly popular among playwrights during the period of Middle Comedy. In addition to Amphis, three more poets, Antiphanes (PCG 2,381), Eubulus (PCG 5,220–223), and Alexis (PCG 2,89), also wrote plays entitled Κυβευταί (The Dice-Players), while Pomponius wrote an Aleones (CRF[3]: 270). Regarding Amphis, this is the second time that he deals with this subject; cf. fr. 11, with comm. ad loc.

The title translates as Dice-Players, and designates in particular only those who gamble with dice (κύβοι / kuboi), and not any type of gamblers, e. g. those who gamble with knucklebones (ἀστράγαλοι). Paradoxically enough, gambling with knucklebones was considered a noble activity and had positive connotations, whereas gambling with dice (κυβεύειν) had negative associations and was ubiquitously treated as an ill-reputed and daredevil habit, leading to (individual and collective) financial damage and disruption; cf. Kurke (1999a) esp. 283–295 (and also the entire Ch. 7; pp. 247–298). Yet, the disrepute that accompanied dicing did not deter the Athenians from unreservedly indulging in this game. See further comm. on Amphis fr. 11 ("Interpretation"); Arnott (1996) 347; Hunter (1983) 142–146 (luckily, the names of multiple ancient dice-throws are preserved in Eubulus' surviving fragments of this play).

The title in the plural form is conspicuous (cf. Amphis' Ἔριθοι). It could be that the title-figures of Dice-Players, naturally central to the plot, also constituted the play's chorus; if so, this would be a rare case of chorus revival in fourth century. On the intriguing issue of what happened to the comic chorus during the fourth century and beyond see Maidment 1935; Webster ([2]1970) 58–63; Hunter 1979 and (1983) 191, Rothwell 1995; Webster & Green ([3]1978) 118–119, AS 3–4 (archaeological evidence).

fr. 25 (25 K.)

Poll. 7.203
σκιράφια· καὶ τὸν σ κ ι ρ α φ ε υ τ ὴ ν Ἄμφις εἴρηκεν ἐν τοῖς Κυβευταῖς gambling-house: and Amphis has mentioned the term "s k i r a p h e u t e s" (dice-player) in "The Dice-Players".

Metre Unknown

⏑⏑––

Discussion Meineke 3,310f.; Bothe 484; Kock 2,243; Edmonds 2,322f.; PCG 2,224; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 302

Citation Context The information that Amphis used the term σκιραφευτής to designate the dice-player is preserved by Pollux, in Book 7 of his Onomasticon, within a section on terms referring to gambling with dice (e. g. κυβεία: dicing; κυβεύτρια: female dice-player; etc.), including the names of various dice-throws (7.203–206). In Book 7 Pollux discusses a huge number of arts (τέχναι) of all sorts, whilst also quoting the various terms employed in each case. It is remarkable that in 7.201, before discussing prostitution and dicing (definitely not a coincidental thematic conjunction), Pollux makes the following disparaging comment, by way of introduction to his next subjects: εἰ δὲ χρὴ καὶ τὰς αἰσχίους πράξεις τέχνας ὀνομάζειν (if shameful activities must be called "arts" too…).

Pollux' low-esteem for dicing, rather than being surprising, is in line with the universal attitude towards this activity (cf. discussion above). Yet, the key point here is that this is one of many instances where Amphis' penchant for unusual language drew the attention of late antiquity lexicographers, thus securing the survival of such, elsewhere unattested, terms (see Intro. 3 "Tradition and Reception").

Interpretation The term σκιραφευτής is a hapax term and one of Amphis' coinages (cf. Intro. 6 "Language"). It denotes the dice-player and etymologically derives from the Athenian suburb of Σκίρον (Skiron), a disreputable area of brothels and gambling-houses (cf. below). Regarding the universal disrepute attached to dicing see comm. on Amphis fr. 11 ("Interpretation").

Despite the regular occurrence of several other cognate terms (e. g. σκιραφεῖον / σκιράφιον, σκίραφος, σκιραφώδης), this is the only instance of σκιραφευτής within the surviving corpus of Greek literature. In fact, the very way that Pollux mentions the term in relation to Amphis strongly suggests that to Pollux' knowledge (as also to our knowledge) Amphis was the only one who had ever used this term; i. e. the phrase καὶ τὸν σκιραφευτὴν Ἄμφις εἴρηκεν should be comprehended as "and as to skirafeutes, it is Amphis who mentioned the word…" (as if this were an answer to a question about the term's source). In Pollux' text the term is in the accusative case, but there is no way to know in which case and number it was used by Amphis, and whether it was used simply once or several times throughout the play.

Given its meaning, the presence of the term σκιραφευτής (dice-player) is naturally most apposite within a play entitled Κυβευταί (The Dice-Players).

Here it is significant to stress that not only are σκιραφευτής and κυβευτής synonymous, but also there are two synonymous groups of terms; one group consisting of terms that are cognate with σκιραφευτής (e. g. σκιραφεῖον [or σκιράφιον]: gambling-house; σκίραφος: dice-box; cf. LSJ[9] s. v.), and another group consisting of terms that are cognate with κυβευτής (κύβος: dice; κυβεῖον and κυβευτήριον: gambling-house; κυβεύω: play at dice; κυβεία: dice-playing; etc.). The former group misses an equivalent term for κύβος, counts fewer terms, and – most importantly – its constituent terms occur much more sporadically in our sources (hence, it comes as no surprise that σκιραφευτής is only used by Amphis – and registered by Pollux).

The etymology of σκιραφεῖον (and its cognates) is discussed by several ancient sources, the earliest of which is the historian Theopompus (fourth century BC); his testimony (FGrH 115 F 228) is preserved by Harpocration s. v. σκιράφια: σκιράφια ἔλεγον τὰ κυβευτήρια, ἐπειδὴ διέτριβον ἐν Σκίρῳ οἱ κυβεύοντες, ὡς Θεόπομπος ἐν τῇ ν΄ ὑποσημαίνει (they called the gambling-houses "skiraphia" as well, because the gamblers used to frequent and spend their time (gambling) at the area of Skiron, as Theopompus attests in Book 50).[14] See also Steph. Byz. s. v. Σκῖρος: Ἀρκαδίας κατοικία … ἔστι καὶ ἕτερον Σκίρον τόπος Ἀττικός … ἐν δὲ τῷ τόπῳ τούτῳ αἱ πόρναι ἐκαθέζοντο. ἴσως δὲ καὶ τὸ σκιραφεῖον, ὅπερ δηλοῖ τὸν τόπον εἰς ὃν οἱ κυβευταὶ συνίασι. καὶ ὁ σκιροφόρος, ὃ σημαίνει τὸν ἀκόλαστον καὶ κυβευτήν, ἀπὸ τῶν ἐν Σκίρῳ διατριβόντων (Skiros [ἡ] is a village in Arcadia … and there is also Skiron [τό Σκίρον or Σκῖρον; cf. LSJ[9] s. v.], an Athenian suburb … in this area the whores used to settle. And possibly both terms "skirapheion", i. e. the place where the dice-players gather, and "skiroforos", designating someone who is licentious and a dice-player, derive from those who spend their time at Skiron). Cf. Alciphr. 3.8.25, Sud. s. v. σκιραφεῖον. Two alternative – though rather improbable, if not absurd – etymological attempts are either attribution to some notorious gambler called Skirafos (Σκίραφος), the alleged inventor of gambling equipment, or else to the practice of gambling within the temple of Athina Skiras (Phot. s. v. σκιραφεῖα, EM p. 717.28; cf. Eust. ad Od. 1,28.37–38).

[14] NB that in BNJ (2007 –) Keaney's translation of Theopompus' testimony (" … the people of Skiros used to spend their time gambling") and his subsequent commentary on the island of Skyros (written with a -y-) are erroneous.

Λευκάς (Leukas)
("Leucas")

Discussion Meineke 3,311 & 1,405 n. 85, 406; Bothe 484f.; Kock 2,243; Edmonds 2,322f.; PCG 2,224 (& 5,81); Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 302; Papachrysostomou 81–82

Title The title denotes the Greek island of Leucas (also known as "Lefkada"), situated in the Ionian Sea, north of Ithaca. This play-title of Amphis is mentioned only once in the manuscript tradition, in Athenaeus 7.277c, where it is preserved only by codex Marcianus (A; on his quality see Arnott 2000 and Intro. 3 "Tradition & Reception"). For obvious reasons of citation, it is preserved in the dative case: Λευκάδι (i. e. Amphis says … in the play called "Leucas").

However, in the early nineteenth century Meineke (1,405 n. 85) suggested that, instead of Λευκάς, Amphis' play-title should rather be ("sive potius") Λευκαδία (The Girl from the island of Leucas), on the grounds that (i) Alexis (with whom Amphis already shares nine similar play-titles; cf. Intro. 8) also wrote a play entitled Λευκαδία ἢ Δραπέται (PCG 2,97f.); so Λευκαδία would be the tenth shared play-title between the two playwrights; and (ii) Menander also wrote a Λευκαδία-play: "Λευκὰς apud Ath. VII p. 277c … pro quo legendum est Λευκαδία, quo titulo Alexidis et Menandri fabulae ferebantur" (Meineke 1,406). Still, in vol. 3 of his edition of comic fragments (1840), Meineke prints Λευκάς (p. 311) as Amphis' play-title, with the note "scribendum videtur Λευκαδίᾳ" (instead of Λευκάδι, preserved in codex A). It should be noted that Diphilus also wrote a Λευκαδία (PCG 5,81), and Antiphanes a Λευκάδιος (PCG 2,387f.). In addition, Turpilius wrote a Leucadia (CRF[3]: 113–118), largely an adaptation of Menander's homonymous play (Arnott 1979–2000: ii.221–245).

Apart from Bothe and Edmonds, all editors of Amphis have since followed Meineke's advice to read Λευκαδίᾳ instead of Λευκάδι in Ath. 7.277c. Nevertheless, I do not consider Meineke's reasoning (i. e. maintaining Amphis' correspondence with Alexis on play-titles, and with Menander) an adequate justification for altering the manuscript tradition and, subsequently, Amphis' play-title. At the same time, it is true that play-titles that designate a girl / woman originating from a place other than Athens are highly common in both Middle and New Comedy. Hence, a Λευκαδία-play would place Amphis in this huge reservoir of comic play-titles consisting of ethnics, and mostly female ones (several of them denoting origin from an island).[15] Yet,

[15] The examples are abundant; e. g. Σαμία (The Girl from Samos) by Anaxandrides and Menander; Κνιδία (The Girl from Cnidus) by Alexis and Sopater; Δηλία (The having not an ethnic designating origin from a place, but a place itself (and specifically an island) featuring as the play's title is not unparalleled within the surviving comic evidence. Timocles wrote a play entitled Δῆλος (Delos; PCG 7,756f.), which Meineke (3,591) would also like to see corrected to the ethnic Δήλιος (The Man from Delos). Faced with Meineke's urge to "tidy up" and homogenize the manuscript tradition (in both Amphis and Timocles' cases), it is important to restate a quintessential principle of textual criticism: the manuscript tradition should remain unaltered, unless it is absolutely necessary to emend it; e. g. to restore metrical, syntactical, or grammatical correctness, and occasionally semantic soundness. It is clear that in Amphis' case it is not necessary to alter Λευκάδι into Λευκαδίᾳ, merely for the sake of uniformity with the other Λευκαδία-plays and other play-titles featuring ethnics. After all, comic topoi and literary trends are supposed to be shaped naturally, whilst leaving room for innovation and resourceful experimentation with and against all stereotypes.

Apart from Timocles' Delos, Amphis' Leucas is also paralleled by the play Sicily (Σικελία) by Demetrius I (PCG 5,8–10; cf. Orth 2014: 162–167).

Regarding the setting of Amphis' present play, the obvious and most probable guess is the island of Leucas; for it would be hard to justify the play's title, if the action were taking place elsewhere. The one surviving fragment features a comic stereotype, fish purchase, which is commonly associated with Athens; yet, this is not always the case within our surviving comic evidence (cf. "Interpretation"), and we can assume – with enough certainty – that Amphis' play was taking place on the island of Leucas. In addition, it is perhaps material that the setting of Menander's (and Turpilius') Leucadia-plays can be positively identified as being the island of Leucas, and specifically Apollo's temple on the cliff of cape Leucatas; moreover, both Menander and Turpilius focused on the daily life of contemporary, ordinary people (see Wilamowitz 1913: 25–26; Webster [2]1960: 57 n. 2, and 1974: 161–162; Arnott 1979–2000: ii.222–227), rather than e. g. pursuing a mythical plot about Sappho (a suggestion first argued by Ribbeck 1854: 34–37).

The plot of Amphis' play is similarly hard to establish. The fragment reveals a snapshot from contemporary reality and everyday life (just like Menander's play). But the location of Leucas, featuring in the title, automatically evokes Girl from Delos) by Antiphanes and Sophilus; Ἀνδρία (The Girl from Andros) by Menander; Λήμνιαι (The Women from Lemnus) by Aristophanes, Antiphanes, Nicochares, and Diphilus; Μιλησία (The Girl from Miletus) by Alexis, Agathenor, and Philemo Jr.; Βοιωτία (The Girl from Boeotia) by Antiphanes, Theophilus, and Menander; Κορινθία (The Girl from Corinth) by Antiphanes and Philemo, etc.

---

the myth of Sappho, her love affair with Phaon and her eventual suicide (see further comm. under Amphis' Sappho); hence, we cannot rule out the possibility that the present play was a myth parody dealing with the love affair between the poetess and Phaon (in which case elements from contemporary reality could have blended with myth, as is the norm in Middle Comedy; cf. Intro. 4 "Themes & Motifs"). However, the fact that Amphis wrote a play that is precisely entitled Sappho could be used as an argument either for or against the hypothesis for a Sappho-related plot for the current play. That is, either Amphis re-worked the same subject later in his career, just as Aristophanes did with Peace, Clouds, and Thesmophoriazusae, or the existence of a play apparently dedicated to Sappho could eliminate the possibility of a different play of his having a similar subject.

fr. 26 (26 K.)

ὅστις ἀγοράζων ὄψον <– ×–⏑–> ἐξὸν ἀπολαύειν ἰχθύων ἀληθινῶν, ῥαφανῖδας ἐπιθυμεῖ πρίασθαι, μαίνεται

2 ἀληθινῶν codd.: Φαληρικῶν Kock

Anyone who, shopping for a relish in the market, longs to buy radishes,
when it is possible to enjoy true fish, is crazy

Ath.[1] 7.277c
ὅστις — μαίνεται, φησὶν Ἄμφις ἐν Λευκάδι (A, ἐν Λευκαδίᾳ corr. Meineke, om. CE).
"Anyone — crazy", says Amphis in "Leucas".

Ath.[2] epit. 2.57b-c εὐτελὲς δὲ σφόδρα ἔδεσμα ἡ ῥαφανίς. Ἄμφις· ὅστις — μαίνεται.
Radish is an exceedingly cheap foodstuff. Amphis (says): "Anyone — crazy".

Metre Iambic trimeter
1. –⏑⏑⏑– –|–⏑ <– ×–⏑–> (penthemimeral caesura)
2. –⏑⏑⏑– –|–⏑– ⏑–⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
3. ⏑⏑–⏑|⏑⏑ ––⏑– ––⏑– (triemimeral caesura)

Discussion Meineke 3,311; Bothe 484f.; Kock 2,243; Edmonds 2,323–325; PCG 2,225; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 302; Papachrysostomou 82–84

Citation Context The present fragment is cited by Athenaeus twice; at 7.277c (along with the play's title) and at 2.57b-c (with only the poet's name, leaving out the play-title). In the former case, Athenaeus, assuming the role of external narrator temporarily, addresses Timocrates and embarks on a detailed enumeration of fish discussed and / or consumed by the banqueters throughout the symposion. The present fragment serves as introduction to the lengthy account that follows (cf. "Citation Context" for fr. 16). Regarding the citation of the fragment by the Epitome (2.57b-c), where the play-title is unsurprisingly omitted (cf. Arnott 2000 and Intro. 3 "Tradition & Reception"), the purpose is to prove the humbleness and cheapness of radishes, within a wider discussion of this foodstuff starting at 2.56e.

Constitution of Text In l. 2 the manuscript tradition unanimously preserves the reading ἀληθινῶν, which along with ἰχθύων conveys the – admittedly – uncommon the notion of true / genuine fish; cf. Meineke (1867) 29. Therefore, Kock (2,243) suggested to adopt the reading Φαληρικῶν instead, which is paralleled by a number of passages; e. g. Ar. Ach. 901 and Av. 76, Antiph. fr. 204.7, etc. However, the manuscripts' reading ἀληθινῶν is paralleled by Macho fr. 5.29 (καράβων ἀληθινῶν) and Ptochopr. 4.319 (ἀληθινὰ παγούρια). I do not consider it necessary to alter the manuscript tradition in Amphis' case, since we can indeed deduce meaningful sense out of the preserved reading. The expression ἰχθύων ἀληθινῶν can be understood as a colloquialism. The usage of ἀληθινός may be idiomatic, designed to emphasise either the high quality of fish, i. e. "fish worth the name", or its freshness; alternatively, as opposed to radishes, fish could thus be designated as "the real thing", "real / solid food". Lorenzoni 1984 co-examines all three passages (Amphis, Macho, Ptochoprodromica) and argues in favour of a colloquial use of the adjective ἀληθινός.

Interpretation The fragment is a snapshot from contemporary reality; a character expresses his irritation, faced with the prospect of someone buying radishes instead of fish – although he can afford the latter (on shopping for fish see Amphis fr. 30). This could be a fishmonger advertising his wares in the market or a food-guru (cf. fr. 16) delivering gastronomical advice. The phrasing does not necessarily locate the speaker at the market (ἀγορά) when he makes these comments; besides, the introductory ὅστις-clause is typically employed in cases of generalisation of argument (see comm. on Amphis fr. 21.1). However, the crucial question we need to ask is not whether we are at the market or not, but whether we are in Athens or on the island of Leucas, given that the play-title reasonably seems to imply the latter as the play's location. Greek Comedy abounds in passages capturing a scene / conversation near a fishmonger's stall or else a discussion (mostly a caustic critique) about some aspect of their profession, e. g. Amphis fr. 30 (see further examples and comm. ad. loc.). In these cases the location is usually Athens; yet, the speaker in Diph. fr. 67 acknowledges (to his disappointment) that it is not only in Athens that fishmongers are treacherous (as he used to believe), but this is how they are everywhere (his ἐνταῦθα, l. 5, designates a place other than Athens; perhaps the island of Aegina). Another fragment by Diphilus (fr. 31) mentions a law (whether real or imaginary is immaterial to our case) that supposedly regulated ostentatious fish purchases in Corinth. This twofold evidence from Diphilus regarding fish trade carried out outside Athens, but in terms that resemble those of Athens, allows us to assume that Amphis' present fragment is similarly a snapshot from a contemporary discussion about some (past, present, future; real or imaginary) fish purchase that occurs not in Athens, but on the island of Leucas.

The tenor of this fragment is similar to Amphis fr. 22. According to the speaker, only a fool would prefer radishes to fish, provided one can afford it. The passage is most easily interpreted as a straightforward comparison between the two foodstuffs; the superiority of fish is categorically established. Yet, we cannot rule out the possibility that the taste for radishes is offered as an exemplum for uncultivated taste in a context which deals with the choice of other products or services, e. g. hetairai; i. e. if one can afford a high-priced (μεγαλόμισθον) hetaira, like Phryne, he would be fool to opt for a cheap hetaira from a brothel; cf. comm. on frr. 23 and 24. Besides, the assimilation of desirable hetairai with fish is a comic topos; e. g. Archipp. fr. 27, Antiph. fr. 27 (cf. Konstantakos 2000a: 63–93), and Trygaeus' double-entendres in Ar. Pax 709–718. See Davidson (1993) 62–66 and (1997) passim.

Metre Despite the lacuna of five metrical elements in l. 1 (–×–⏑–), the overall sense is syntactically complete. Therefore, it is difficult to suggest a plausible supplement for it. Obvious conjectures which suggest themselves include: (i) a parenthesis meaning "in my opinion"; e. g. ὡς ἐμοί δοκεῖ, and (ii) a comment about the financial condition of the purchaser; e. g. εἰ μή 'στιν πένης. Edmonds (2,324) suggests ἐπὶ τὸ δειπνίον (paralleled by Ephipp. fr. 9). However, the uncertainties are too many to justify choosing any conjecture.

1a ὅστις … A stereotypical introductory clause; see comm. on Amphis fr. 21.1.

1b ἀγοράζων The present meaning is "to buy in the market", although the verb's original meaning is "to frequent the ἀγορά". The term ἀγορά designates not only the assembly (and the place of the assembly), but also – from quite early on (at least since Hom.Epigr. 14.5) – the market-place; cf. LSJ[9] s. v. Accordingly, the sense of ἀγοράζω gradually extended to include the meaning of to buy in the market (cf. LSJ[9] s. v., Chadwick 1996: 34–39), and this is how this verb is commonly used in comic texts; e. g. Ar. Ach. 625, 719–720; Anaxandr. fr. 29; Anaxil. fr. 28. However, the verb's original meaning did not become obsolete; ἀγοράζω means to frequent the agora in Cratin. fr. 257, Ar. Eq. 1373–1374 (where the anc. sch. explain ἀγοράσει as ἐν ἀγορᾷ διατρίψει: "… he will spend time in the market"), Lys. 556 (cf. anc. sch. ad loc.: ἀγοράζοντας· ἐν ἀγορᾷ διατρίβοντας), and 633 (cf. anc. sch. ad loc. for similar interpretation of the verb).

For the progressive evolution, the multiple uses, as well as the political and ideological connotations attached to the Athenian agora throughout the centuries, see Thompson & Wycherley (1972) passim, esp. 170–191; Kenzler 1999; Anderson (2003) 87–103.

1c ὄψον According to Athenaeus 7.277a: ὄψον κυρίως καλεῖται πᾶν τὸ πυρὶ κατασκευαζόμενον εἰς ἐδωδήν (the term "opson" is properly applied to anything rendered edible by the application of fire). Within the tripartite division of ancient Greek diet, next to bread and wine (which are the two main constituents), ὄψον (opson) covers almost everything else. The word ὄψον is a generic term used to describe any kind of cooked food or (occasionally uncooked) relish or sauce that could be accompanied with bread (and wine); cf. Hom. Od. 3.479–480, Plu. Them. 29.11. But especially in Athens ὄψον was also a regular appellation of fish; see Plu. 667f πολλῶν ὄντων ὄψων ἐκνενίκηκεν ὁ ἰχθὺς μόνος ἢ μάλιστά γ' ὄψον καλεῖσθαι διὰ τὸ πολὺ πάντων ἀρετῇ κρατεῖν (though there are many delicacies, fish has won the title, either exclusively or pre-eminently, of 'delicacy' (opson), because it far excels all others in quality); cf. Poll. 7.26, Archestr. fr. 20.2 (see Olson & Sens 2000: 47–48, 92). See Davidson 1995 and (1997) 20–26; Dalby (1995) 57–129; Hug in RE 18,759–760 s. v. opson; LSJ[9] s. v.

In the present fragment the term ὄψον has the all-embracing sense of relish / delicacy (rather than exclusively fish), since the speaker considers as possible options both radishes and fish.

1d ἀγοράζων ὄψον The meaning of this periphrasis is expressed in one word in Amphis fr. 30.14: ὀψωνοῦντα (ubi vide).

2 ἰχθύων ἀληθινῶν See "Constitution of Text".

3a ῥαφανῖδας Radishes are often mentioned in comic passages and, mostly, in food lists; e. g. Cratin. fr. 350, Eup. fr. 338, Metag. fr. 18, Antiph. fr. 273, etc. In certain cases, such as Amphis' present fragment and Ar. Pl. 544, they are explicitly treated as a cheap and humble foodstuff. Consumption of radishes is also said to cause bad breath in Diod. fr. 2.35–37. Yet, they were commonly regarded as an aphrodisiac; cf. sch. on Ar. Nu. 981. The Scholiast on Ar. Pl. 544 gives a fanciful etymology of ῥαφανίς: παρὰ τὸ ῥᾳδίως φαίνεσθαι.

λόγος γὰρ ὡς σπειρομένη θᾶττον ἄνεισιν (because it shows easily; that is, when sown, it quickly springs up); cf. Ath. 2.56e. In Amphis' present fragment radishes look even less tasty, as they are compared to the exquisite delicacy of fish. See Dalby (2003) 277–278.

3b πρίασθαι The verb πρίαμαι is synonymous to ἀγοράζω (in its present meaning; cf. s. v. above) and means to buy; it is commonly used throughout Comedy (e. g. Ar. Ach. 812, Nu. 23; Alex. fr. 47.6). The combined usage of these verbs (ἀγοράζω and πρίαμαι) not only serves the effect of variation in terminology, but it also provides for a graphic visualisation of the scene described; the present participle ἀγοράζων (denoting duration) creates the visualisation of an undecided person surveying the market (agora) with the purpose of buying something, while the infinitive πρίασθαι seals his final choice.

3c μαίνεται For absurd gastronomical choices as a comic topos see comm. on Amphis fr. 22.2b.

Ὀδυσσεύς (Odysseus)
("Odysseus")

Discussion Edmonds 2,324f.; PCG 2,225 (& 5,231); Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 302; Papachrysostomou 84–86

Title Amphis' present play belongs in a widespread dramatic trend of dealing with and staging (parts of) Odysseus' story. Odysseus is a most popular and omnipresent character in both comedy and tragedy (and even outside the dramatic genre; cf. Hippon. fr. *74). He already features in Sicilian Comedy, in plays by Epicharmus (Ὀδυσσεὺς αὐτόμολος and Ὀδυσσεὺς ναυαγός; PCG 1,60–70) and Dinolochus (Κίρκα ἢ Ὀ[δυσσ- ; PCG 1,178). He is also the title-figure of plays by Cratinus (Ὀδυσσῆς; PCG 4,192–200), Theopompus (Ὀδυσσεύς vel Ὀδυσσῆς; PCG 7,724–726), Anaxandrides (Ὀδυσσεύς; PCG 2,253–255), Eubulus (Ὀδυσσεὺς ἢ Πανόπται; PCG 5,231), and Alexis (Ὀδυσσεὺς ἀπονιπτόμενος (or Ὀδ. ἀπονιζόμενος), and Ὀδυσσεὺς ὑφαίνων; PCG 2,110–112). Additionally, several other plays bear titles that are closely associated with various aspects of Odysseus' story; e. g. Phormis' Ἀλκίνους (Alcinous); Theopompus' Πηνελόπη (Penelope); Eubulus' Ναυσικάα (Nausica); Philyllius' Πλύντριαι ἢ Ναυσικάα (Washerwomen or Nausica; cf. Orth 2015: 178–179); Polyzelus' Νίπτρα (The Bath Scene); and Σειρῆνες (Sirens) by Epicharmus, Theopompus, and Nicopho. For an analysis of all comic plays relating to Odysseus see Schmidt 1887–1888; cf. Bergk (1838) 413.

As far as tragedy is concerned, Aeschylus (TrGF 3,301) and Philocles (TrGF 1,142) wrote a Πηνελόπη (Penelope), Sophocles wrote two plays pertaining to Odysseus, Ναυσικάα ἢ Πλύντριαι (Nausica or Washerwomen; TrGF 4,361f.) and Νίπτρα (The Bath Scene; TrGF 4,373f.), while Apollodorus (TrGF 1,209) and Chaeremon (TrGF 1,220) wrote an Ὀδυσσεύς. There is also a contemporary vase painting portraying Arete and Alcinous welcoming the shipwrecked Odysseus (Bieber [2]1961: 136). With all probability, tragedy's treatment of Odysseus' theme was regularly parodied by contemporary comedy, especially given comedy's well-known penchant for myth travesty and comic burlesque during the fourth century BC; cf. Intro. 4 ("Themes & Motifs").

Regarding Amphis' case, the play-title straightforwardly establishes a solid mythical backdrop to the plot. At the same time, the play's one surviving fragment introduces a substantial element of contemporary reality (preparations for a special occasion are underway, featuring contemporary luxurious items; cf. "Interpretation"). With all probability, Amphis' Odysseus is yet another example of Middle Comedy's much loved and frequently employed twofold motif that consists of myth travesty and intricate intermingling of traditional myth with contemporary reality. It is possible that anachronistic elements from real life infiltrated the mythical / heroic world of Odysseus, and / or that Odysseus was (partially) presented in a context resembling the fourth century world. Furthermore, Alexis' and Anaxandrides' comic handlings of Odysseus probably involved a good deal of anachronism and myth burlesque. Alex. fr. 159 (from Odysseus Weaving) features an attack on fishmongers' practices; and Arnott ad loc. (1996: 465) detects an "anachronistic transfer of the mythical situation to contemporary Athens", whereas in Anaxandr. fr. 35 Odysseus is believed to be addressing the Athenians, in a scene that Millis (2001: 129) describes as an "amalgam of legend and reality". The plot possibilities in Amphis' case are manifold and fairly elusive, and are discussed in detail under "Interpretation".

fr. 27 (27 K.)

ἐρίοισι τοὺς τοίχους κύκλῳ Μιλησίοις, ἔπειτ' ἀλείφειν τῷ Μεγαλλείῳ μύρῳ, καὶ τὴν βασιλικὴν θυμιᾶτε μίνδακα.
(Β.) ἀκήκοας σύ, δέσποτ', ἤδη πώποτε
5 τὸ θυμίαμα τοῦτο;

1 "in fine eius versus qui proxime praecedebat fortasse verbum ἐμπεταννύναι poeta posuerat" Meineke (3,312). "ante ἐρίοισι τοὺς τοίχους excidisse suspicor ἐμπεταννύναι λέγω" Meineke Anal. p. 337 2 μεγαλλίῳ A: corr. Cobet

(A.) … the walls all around with Milesian wool, then anoint (them) with Megalleian unguent, and burn the choice mindax incense.
(B.) Master, have you ever heard of 5 this kind of incense before?

Ath. 15.691a
τοῦ Μεγαλλ<ε>ίου δὲ μύρου μνημονεύει καὶ Ἄμφις ἐν Ὀδυσσεῖ διὰ τούτων· ἐρίοισι — τοῦτο;

Amphis too mentions the Megalleian unguent in "Odysseus" in the following passage: "(A.) … the walls — before?"

Metre Iambic trimeter

1. ⏑⏑–⏑|– ––⏑– ––⏑– (triemimeral caesura)
2. ⏑–⏑– –|–⏑– ––⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
3. ––⏑⏑⏑ –|–⏑– ⏑–⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
4. ⏑–⏑– ⏑|–⏑– ––⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
5. ⏑–⏑– ⏑|–⏑ (penthemimeral caesura)

Discussion Meineke 3,311f.; Bothe 485; Kock 2,243f.; Edmonds 2,324f.; PCG 2,225; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 302f.; Papachrysostomou 84–88

Citation Context The present fragment is quoted in the last book of Athenaeus' Deipnosophistae, at 15.691a, along with other literary references, as evidence for the usage of a particular kind of luxurious unguent, the so-called Megalleian, within a wider discussion about various types of perfumes.

Constitution of Text The speaker of the fragment gives orders for three arrangements, but only two imperative expressions are present (ἀλείφειν and θυμιᾶτε). Hence, it is reasonable to assume that a third imperative, about the walls' decoration, has been left out. Meineke (3,312) suggested that an imperative expression containing some form of the verb ἐμπεταννύναι (e. g. ἐμπεταννύναι λέγω, as Meineke argued later, 1867: 337) preceded the first line of our fragment, thus complementing the fragmentary sense. As a parallel, Meineke cites a passage from Socrates Rhodius (FGrH 192 F 1), preserved by Ath. 4.147f: οἱ τοῖχοι … διαχρύσοις ἐμπεπετασμένοι ὕφεσι (the walls were draped with cloths interwoven with gold).

In l. 2 the manuscript tradition preserves the reading μεγαλλίῳ, which Cobet (1858: 77) emended into μεγαλλείῳ, and rightly so, since μεγάλλειος is an adjective deriving from a proper name (Μέγαλλος, its inventor; cf. comm. s. v. below); cf. e. g. ἀριστοφάνειος, ζηνοδότειος, ἐπικούρειος, etc. In fact, Cobet emended two further instances of μεγάλλ(ε)ιος found in Athenaeus' text, 12.553b (= Eub. fr. 89) and 15.691a (= Anaxandr. fr. 47).

Interpretation Brisk preparations for a special event/occasion (a feast or a symposion) are underway in this fragment, probably in anticipation of an eminent guest. The lines are divided between speaker A and speaker B (a slave), but more characters (speaking and/or silent) must be present on stage at this point, for – with all probability – this is not an exchange between A and B (if it were, it would be fairly odd content-wise; cf. comm. on l. 4). Given the content / meaning and the plural imperative θυμιᾶτε (l. 3), the following reconstruction is possible: present on stage are a foreman (speaker A), a group of slaves, and a master. The foreman addresses the slaves and assigns them certain tasks. One of the slaves (speaker B) is unaware of the incense called μίνδαξ, and therefore he addresses the master (δέσποτ') expressing his puzzlement (see comm. on l. 4 for further analysis of the reason why the master and the foreman cannot be the same person).

Speaker A tells the slaves to decorate the room using luxurious items (high quality Milesian wool and expensive unguent) and then to scent the air by burning some premium mindax, a special – and apparently rare – kind of incense (μίνδαξ; cf. comm. s. v.). The essence of the orders strongly suggests that they are meant to have been carried out before the guest arrives (i. e. decorating the room and spicing up the air are tasks that need, by definition, to have been executed in advance and certainly not at the guest's presence); besides, there is no evidence in the text to suggest that the guest had already arrived. Hence, we can safely assume that the fragment captures a moment from the fervent preparations prior to the guest's arrival. The accumulation of exceptional products and the uncommon practice of decorating the walls (cf. comm. s. v. τοὺς τοίχους) suggest that this is an outstanding occasion and that a distinguished guest is expected, whom understandably the host wishes to impress. The motif of (anxious) waiting for an important guest recurs in Dionys.Com. fr. 2, where a cook analyses his cooking plans ahead of the arrival of a guest from abroad (cf. Papachrysostomou 2008: 155–174). What is more, giving orders or instructions to slaves, assistants, or other comic characters is a frequently recurring comic pattern; see Amphis fr. 7 ("Interpretation", with further parallels). For the intriguing possibility that Amphis fr. 45 (featuring a parallel context) belonged in this very same scene of Odysseus play, see "Interpretation" ad loc.

Regarding the present fragment, due to the fragmentary nature of our evidence, the range of plot possibilities is practically endless. A reasonable hypothesis (based on mythical tradition) is that the expected guest is Odysseus himself. Keeping his traditional identity as a shipwrecked sailor, Odysseus is possibly the one to be hosted and for whom these arrangements are about to take place. In such a case, the obvious assumption is that Odysseus' prospective host (and the speaker of this fragment) is either Alcinous or the Cyclops. However, since myth burlesque is the norm in Middle Comedy (see Intro. 4 "Themes & Motifs"), one cannot exclude the possibility of a completely fictitious incident, based on the established myth. Given the freedom with which Comedy treats myth, a reversal of roles between Odysseus and Alcinous or the Cyclops is a plausible scenario; cf. Alexis' Ὀδυσσεὺς ὑφαίνων that may have featured Odysseus as the one weaving the famous shroud – instead of Penelope (see Arnott 1996: 465–466). Likewise, in Amphis' play Odysseus could be portrayed as an affectionate host, about to entertain in his royal palace (hence the luxurious preparations) either Alcinous (possibly pictured as a shipwrecked sailor, cast on the shores of Ithaca) or the Cyclops, with Odysseus returning the "hospitality" that he received from him. Yet, the opportunities for a comic effect would increase further if the Cyclops was the host; Odysseus and Polyphemus could have appeared as good friends (just like Orestes and Aegisthus in Aristotle's locus classicus, Po. 1453ᵃ37–39). If so, an additional comic twist would be the conversion of the Cyclops from an anti-social man-eating monster to a diligent host with social graces and servants, his cave having being metamorphosed into a grand dwelling.

Alternatively, within an entirely different scenario (featuring fewer twists of established mythical tradition), this could the cleaning-up scene after the killing of the suitors by Odysseus; i. e. Odysseus orders the slaves to clean the room, decorate and anoint the walls, and then scent the air, so that Penelope is prevented from seeing the results of massacre (cf. Odysseus' orders to cleanse and purify the house in Hom. Od. 22.437–445 and 22.481–494). Kock (2,244) suggested that this is a conversation between Penelope and Eumaeus ("conloquuntur Penelope … et Eumaeus"); however, this reconstruction does not accommodate the male vocative δέσποτ'.

The possibilities are inexhaustible; yet, they all are ultimately unprovable.

1a ἐρίοισι … Μιλησίοις Wool produced in Miletus was considered a luxury item; it was widely known for its exceptionally high quality and its distinctive softness, as is attested in various sources; e. g. Ar. Lys. 729 and Ra. 543a (cf. anc. sch. for both passages), Eub. fr. 89, Ael. NA 17.34, Ath. 12.519b (Sybarites' clothes were famously made out of Milesian wool) and Ath. 12.540d (sheep from Miletus were accordingly highly esteemed as well). See further Gow (²1952) ii.300–301.

1b τοὺς τοίχους The practice of decorating the walls by draping them with cloths / tapestries is attested only here and in Socrates Rhodius (first century BC) FGrH 192 F 1 (ap. Ath. 4.147f) οἱ τοῖχοι ἁλουργέσι καὶ διαχρύσοις ἐμπεπετασμένοι ὕφεσι (the walls were draped with purple tapestries through which ran threads of gold; this is the passage used by Meineke as a parallel to the present case; cf. "Constitution of Text"). Instead, what is commonly attested in our texts (usually within a symposion context) is the practice of draping not the walls but the couches (κλῖναι) with coverlets, carpets, and rugs, along with the supply of cushions; e. g. Ar. Ec. 840 (κλῖναί τε σισυρῶν καὶ δαπίδων νενασμέναι: the couches are draped with cushions and coverlets), Ach. 1085–1093 (cf. Olson 2002: 335), V. 676–677, Pl.Com. fr. 230, etc. Cf. further Boardman 1994. Draping the (wooden) couches with coverlets, apart from the aesthetic effect, had an essentially functional aim: to make them more comfortable to sit on. But draping the walls was exclusively a decorative activity, meant to create an atmosphere of luxury. It is instructive that the occasion described in the aforementioned passage by Socrates Rhodius is the overwhelmingly sumptuous royal banquet (βασιλικὸν συμπόσιον) that Queen Cleopatra of Egypt prepared for Marcus Antonius when she first met him. The fact that the closest parallel to the practice mentioned in Amphis' fragment is Cleopatra's lavish reception for Marcus Antonius is – at least – intriguing!

2a ἀλείφειν This infinitive is equivalent to the second person plural of the imperative, (i. e. ἀλείφετε) and is used in conjunction with the imperative θυμῶτε (Smyth 1956: §2013). But syntactically ἀλείφειν seems to be missing its object. Normally it is people who are anointed with oil or unguent (cf. LSJ[9] s. v.); besides, anointing guests with unguent is a typical feature of a feast/symposion (cf. comm. on Amphis fr. 9.4a). However, the expected guest (the obvious candidate to be anointed) is not present, since the fragment captures the moment of vigorous preparations prior to the guest's arrival (cf. "Interpretation"). Though not particularly common, material objects – apart from humans – are also mentioned as being anointed in our sources; cf. Diph. fr. 75.2 (ἀ. τὴν τράπεζαν: dining-table); Thphr. Char. 21.10 (δακτυλίδιον ἀ.: small ring); Artem. 2.33 (ἀγάλματα ἀ.: statues). Likewise, in the present fragment the walls (τοίχους; l. 1), although primarily serving as the object of the missing verb (e. g. ἐμπεταννύναι; cf. "Constitution of Text"), can also serve as the object of the infinitive ἀλείφειν. After all, since the host is so eccentric and extravagant that he drapes the walls with expensive Milesian wool, we have no reason to doubt his intention to anoint them as well with some rare unguent.

2b Μεγαλλείῳ μύρῳ The Μεγάλλειον μύρον was a luxurious and strongly perfumed unguent (Thphr. Od. 42, 55), so named after its inventor Megallos (PAA 636610) of Sicily; cf. Ar. fr. 549, Stratt. fr. 34. The mention of this unguent is the reason of this fragment's quotation by Athenaeus (cf. "Citation Context"). Within Comedy it is also mentioned by Pherecr. fr. 149, Anaxandr. fr. 47, and Eub. fr. 89.6. Information about its manufacture is provided by Thphr. Od. 29–30, Dsc. 1.58.3, and Plin. HN 13.13. There has been much confusion in the manuscript tradition regarding the name of both the perfume and its inventor's; Renehan (1969) 13 discusses the corrupt readings μεγαλεῖον (e. g. Ath. 15.690f codex A), and μετάλλειον (e. g. Hsch. s. v.).

Lilja (1972: 58–96) offers a concise overview of unguent's usage in Greek and Roman poetry (including Greek Middle Comedy).

3a μίνδακα The μίνδαξ (ἡ) is a hapax, which Hesychius explains as θυμίαμα ποιόν (μ 1392), and LSJ[9] s. v. as a kind of Persian incense. Despite this term's uniqueness, Athenaeus' quotation of the present fragment was meant to demonstrate the use of Megalleian unguent instead (cf. previous note). Yet, this unheard-of incense is what naturally triggers the reaction of the slave (Speaker B). Unfortunately, we miss the master's reply, which may have been enlightening. Yet, both the slave's bewilderment and the fact that Amphis describes this incense as choice (βασιλικήν) demonstrate the distinctiveness of this item, which harmonises with and further increases the – already overwhelming – sumptuousness of the atmosphere (cf. "Interpretation").

3b βασιλικήν The primary meaning of the adjective βασιλικός is royal, kingly. However, a brief study of the synonymous adjective βασίλειος can be surprisingly instructive. Apart from royal, the adjective βασίλειος is occasionally used in figurative sense to describe something that is choice, first-class, premium, of finest quality (cf. LSJ[9] s. v. 3). The referent is commonly some unguent (βασίλειον μύρον); e. g. Crates fr. 2, Poll. 6.105, Hsch. s. v. βασίλειον, Sapph. fr. 94.18–20 V. (μύρῳ βρενθείῳ βασιληίῳ; cf. Wilamowitz 1913: 51), Plin. HN 13.18 (regale unguentum); cf. also Philemo Lex. (ap. Ath. 3.76f) and Poll. 6.81, where the reference is to figs (σῦκα βασίλεια). Similarly, in Amphis' present fragment we can interpret βασιλικός as meaning choice, exquisite (cf. LSJ[9] s. v. 3); something that is royal cannot – by nature – be anything but exquisite and of highest quality. It is understood that the initial usage/preference of these products (incense, unguent, etc.) by the royal households of the East (mostly Persia and Lydia) lies in the origin of the ensuing figurative use of these adjectives.

4 ἀκήκοας … πώποτε For the style of the question, see comm. on Amphis fr. 9.1. Regarding the content, the conversation would be rather strange, if this were an exchange between two speakers. That is, speaker A says: "Use the royal incense"; then speaker B says: "Have you ever heard of this incense, master?" Yet, speaker A has just mentioned it. But the conversation becomes immediately more meaningful, once we assume that there are more than two persons on stage (cf. "Interpretation): a foreman (speaker A), a group of slaves (one of them is speaker B), and a master. One of the slaves, confused by what the foreman commands, resorts to the authority of his master.

The slave's puzzlement upon hearing an unknown term is paralleled by a number of cases in Comedy, e. g. Amphis fr. 14.2 (γίγγρας: an eastern pipe of piercing sound; cf. comm. ad loc.), Strato fr. 1.34 (οὐλοχύται: barley-groats sprinkled over the sacrificial animal victim), Philem. fr. 45 (ναβλᾶς: the player of the stringed musical instrument νάβλα) and fr. 130 (βουνός: Cyrenaic word for hill). Yet, it does not necessarily follow that the audience shared the comic character's ignorance of the term in any of these cases.

[Ὀπώρα (Opōra)]
("Opora")

Discussion Meineke 3,320f.; Kock 2,244 & 249f.; Edmonds 2,324f.; PCG 2,226 & 234; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 303

Title With all probability, this is yet another false attribution to Amphis (cf. [Callisto] and Amphis fr. 46). No ancient source mentions a play-title Opora as one of Amphis' works and no fragments are anywhere acknowledged as belonging to this play. The case presents great similarity to [Callisto], another made-up play that is also falsely attributed to Amphis (see comm. ad loc.). Again, as with [Callisto], it is Meineke (3,321) who first suggested that Amphis may have written a play called Opora ("ac fortasse etiam fabulae, ex qua illa derivata sunt, Oporam titulum fecerat poeta"). But this was simply meant as a suggestion and Meineke does not acknowledge an Opora as a valid play-title, when he records Amphis' plays, in both vol. 1,406 and vol. 3,312.

Meineke's suggestion was prompted by the combination of two parameters; first, Alexis wrote a play entitled Opora (PCG 2,117f.; a hetaira's name, according to Ath. 13.567c, cf. Arnott 1996: 496–500); and since Amphis already shares nine identical play-titles with Alexis (cf. Intro. 8), a prospect of a tenth shared play-title seemed attractive. Secondly, a combination of evidence (quoted under Amphis fr. 47) attests to the fact that Amphis dealt with the constellation myth of Sirius / Dog-Star (Κύων; Canis Maior), featuring the latter's love for Ὀπώρα (Opora) as the (divine) personification of harvest-time (i. e. late summer) and fruits / crops.[16] In particular, a lacunose excerpt from the annotations of Marcian of Heraclea on [Eratosthenes'] Catasterismi (exc. e Cat. Marc. 33, Maass 1898: 579) informs us that Amphis referred to the rising of the Dog-Star: <Π>ερὶ τοῦ Κυνός· περὶ δὲ τῆς ἀνατολῆς αὐτοῦ Ἄμφις ὁ τῶν κωμῳδιῶν ποιητής φησιν ὅτι ὑπὸ τῶν ἀνθρώπων  (on the Dog-Star; Amphis, the comic playwright, says about his rising that by humans ). This is complemented by two Latin testimonies: (i) a passage from Aratus Latinus (Maass 1898: 251ª19ff.): "de ortu autem eius Amphis carminum poeta ait: … Canis … videns fructus eo tempore maturescere, concupivit ea" (about his rising the playwright Amphis says: the Dog-Star, seeing the crops (Ὀπώρα) being mature at that time, fell in love with her); and (ii) a passage from the Scholiast of Germanicus' Latin version of Aratus (AP, SV; p. 94,15 et 168,3 Br.; Robert

[16] On the personification motif of Opora – famously featuring in Aristophanes' Peace (where Opora and Theoria are pictured as Peace's escorts) – see Newiger (1957) 110–111, 119–122; Shapiro (1993) pl. 72; Kidd (2014) 82–83; LIMC vii.1 55–56.

[2]1963: 168[17]): "Iuppiter … canem caelo intulit. cuius exortus origine continetur tali, ut Amphis tragoediarum scriptor refert: … missus legatus Canis ad Oporam. quam ut vidit eo tempore tempestivam esse, adamavit" (Zeus brought the Dog-Star to the sky. His rising was so astonishing that Amphis, the poet of tragedies (sic), refers to it; … the Dog-Star was sent as an envoy to Opora; and, as soon as he saw her being matured, he fell in love with her); cf. Amphis fr. 47 for full quotation of these testimonies.

All that the three above passages tell us is that Amphis simply mentioned / dealt with the Dog-Star's constellation myth – and not that he wrote a play entirely dedicated to it, called Opora. Therefore, rather than hastily rushing to add to tradition what is not there and construct such a play, it is much wiser to assume that Amphis merely mentioned this topic somewhere in his work – to an extent that is now beyond recovery. It could be in a context of an extensive scene featuring myth burlesque (a favourite Middle Comedy topos; cf. Intro. 4 "Themes & Motifs"), as a mythological paradigm reinforcing a character's arguments (cf. Men. Dysc. 153ff.; see Reinhardt 1974: 106–109), as a passing reference tangential to the main plot, etc.

[17] On several instances the text of Latin scholia is hardly intelligible; NB Robert's note in cr. app. ad loc.: "verba aperte vitiata sanare nequeo".

Οὐρανός (Ouranos)
("Uranus" or "Sky" / "Heaven")

Discussion Edmonds 2,325; PCG 2,226; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 303

Title The title can be interpreted (i) against a mythological background, in relation to Comedy's tendency (already from the fifth century) to describe imaginary scenes (utopias) from the distant past, from the bygone Golden Age (first described in Hes. Op. 109–120; cf. Hom. Od. 9.108–111), often also referred to as the "Age of Cronus"; or (ii) against a contemporary intellectual backdrop of scientific speculation on the structure of the universe. Accordingly, in case (i) "Uranus" is the appropriate translation of Amphis' play-title, whilst in case (ii) it should be "Sky" or "Heaven".

Let us first consider option (i). In Greek mythology Uranus was one of the primeval gods. Born from the Earth (Γαῖα), he later fathered Earth's children (the twelve Titans, the three Cyclops, and the three Hundred-Handers), and was eventually castrated and overthrown by his son Cronus. When Cronus was overthrown by Zeus, the sphere of Sky (ouranos) was allotted to Zeus as his own domain of power (Hes. Th. 126–127, 167–191; Hom. Il. 15.192); cf. Versnel 1987. As already mentioned (Intro. 4 "Themes & Motifs"), mythological themes are fairly common not only in Amphis, but also in the entire period of Middle Comedy. It is plausible that Amphis' Uranus had a substantial mythological background, closely associated with the Hesiodic myth of the Golden Age / Age of Cronus. During the period of Old Comedy there develops a large-scale comic tradition that draws extensively on this mythical background. Intriguingly, Amphis' Uranus lands in the very midst of this tradition; apart from the thematic relevance (suggested already in the play-title), the scarce remains of the play's one surviving fragment strongly suggest a context of comic utopia; cf. "Interpretation".

Option (ii) is also worth considering. By way of alternative, Amphis' Ouranos might have been a play featuring (and parodying) abstract reasoning about natural (astronomical and/or meteorological) phaenomena, physical laws, various scientific advances tracing back to presocratic philosophy (e. g. prediction of eclipses, construction of sundials, etc.). The play may have accommodated a good deal of satire against contemporary intellectuals practising (aspects of) physical philosophy. In this case, the obvious antecedents would be Aristophanes' Clouds and Socrates' satire in that play; cf. Nu. 316–318 οὐράνιαι Νεφέλαι, μεγάλαι θεαὶ ἀνδράσιν ἀργοῖς / αἵπερ γνώμην καὶ διάλεξιν καὶ νοῦν ἡμῖν παρέχουσιν / καὶ τερατείαν καὶ περίλεξιν καὶ κροῦσιν καὶ κατάληψιν (heavenly Clouds, great goddesses for idle men, who provide us with judgment and dialectic and intelligence, fantasy and circumlocution and verbal thrust and parry; cf. Dover 1968: 142–143). Amphis' play may have also featured derision of stylistic subtlety and intellectual refinement (cf. λεπτότης and λεπτολογεῖν; Ar. Nu. 153, 320), and may have also targeted one or more contemporary intellectuals / philosophers.

Options (i) and (ii) are not necessarily mutually exclusive. Uranus, a traditional god, was perhaps being challenged and was eventually ousted not by Zeus but by rationalist intellectuals, in a play situated in fourth century Athens. Certainty is impossible; but I choose to translate the play-title as "Uranus" wherever it occurs in the text below (i. e. as adopting option i), since this coincides not only with Middle Comedy's specific practice of seeking inspiration in mythical tradition, but also with the comic topos of Golden Age utopias. After all, the play bears the name of a divine mythical figure originating from that specific distant past, where such utopias are exclusively situated.

fr. 28 (28 K.)

εἰς τὴν ἑσπέραν χορταζόμενα πᾶσιν ἀγαθοῖς

ἑσπέραν χορταζόμενα πᾶσιν A: ἑσπέραν / χορταζόμενα K-A: χορταζόμενα / πᾶσιν ipsa: -μενοι π- Bothe: -μεσθα π- vel χορτάζομεν / ἅπ- Porson: -μαι / ἐν ἅπ- Bergk (1838) 157

Until the evening being fed on all kinds of goodies

Ath. 3.100a
καὶ Ἄμφις ἐν Οὐρανῷ· εἰς — ἀγαθοῖς

And Amphis in "Uranus": "Until — goodies"

Metre Iambic trimeter
1. – –|–⏑– ––⏑⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
2. –⏑⏑⏑–

Discussion Meineke 3,312; Bothe 485; Kock 2,244; Edmonds 2,324f.; PCG 2,226; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 303

Citation Context The fragment is cited in Athenaeus 3.100a, and is quoted by Ulpian, the symposiarch, in order to demonstrate the usage of the verb χορτάζω (to feed, fatten) in passive voice, χορτάζομαι (to be fed). Amphis' fragment is the sixth and last example on Ulpian's list; however, two of the fragments quoted are tangential to the current issue (Men. fr. 162 features the active form χόρταζε, while S. fr. 666 features the adjective πάγχορτος: all-satiating). For similar oversights in Athenaeus see comm. on Amphis' Erithoi.

Constitution of Text The text as preserved by codex A (cf. Intro. 3 "Tradition & Reception") is meaningful (as much as its fragmentary nature can allow) and scans correctly as iambic trimeter. Therefore, there is no need to adopt any of the available suggestions regarding alternative readings (by Bothe, Porson, and Bergk). Yet, there is a crucial question; how should the preserved text be divided into two lines. Kassel & Austin assign εἰς τὴν ἑσπέραν to line 1 and χορταζόμενα πᾶσιν ἀγαθοῖς to line 2. This provides for two full iambic metres in l. 2, but none of the caesuras can be applied in the resulting sequence: ——⏑⏑⏑ —⏑⏑⏑—. Therefore, I presently chose to assign εἰς τὴν ἑσπέραν χορταζόμενα to line 1, thus providing for a sequence (cf. "Metre") where penthemimeral caesura can be applied (albeit separating the article τὴν from the noun ἑσπέραν); yet, it is possible that the line featured a triemimeral caesura in the preceding, now lost, initial part. The sequence for πᾶσιν ἀγαθοῖς (—⏑ ⏑⏑—) in l. 2 provides for a full iambic metre.

Interpretation Both the context and the meaning are fairly elusive. The speaker narrates how a number of subjects of neuter gender are being fed to satiation all day long. The crucial information that is missing is the subject of the participle χορταζόμενα. The situation described by the speaker is one of unusual abundance and incessant supply of dainties. The participle's present tense communicates the sense of duration; simultaneously, it allows for a twofold interpretation of this situation either as a hapax event or as a regularly repeated one. In either case, the speaker is astonished, mostly by the event's duration, for he emphatically sets off with the temporal definition εἰς τὴν ἑσπέραν. In addition, the passive voice of the participle implies a certain inertia / idleness on the subjects' behalf, i. e. the subjects are being fed – either by an unnamed third party or automatically; in either case, without putting any effort themselves. The picture is complemented by the final detail regarding the wide variety of dainties available (πᾶσιν ἀγαθοῖς). Although consisting of merely six words, this fragment explicitly communicates the notion of repleteness (to an extent bordering with exaggeration) on three levels: (i) duration (all day long), (ii) quantity (fed to satiation), (iii) quality (all-encompassing / extreme variety of foodstuffs). This triple and overwhelming satisfaction is conspicuously unreal; it is utopian.

As mentioned above, there is an established comic tradition consisting of comic utopias that is associated with the bygone, originally Hesiodic (Op.

109–120), Golden Age or Age of Cronus. Typically, the Age of Cronus (visualised in a remote, undefined, past) is associated in Comedy with a utopian context that consists of (a) ample provision of food (and wine) supplies and everything else necessary, a notion that is often epitomized in the typical expression πάντα ἀγαθά (every kind of goodies/ dainties/ foodstuffs) and (b) automation; cf. e. g. Ar. Ach. 976 αὐτόματα πάντ' ἀγαθὰ … πορίζεται (all bounties are supplied spontaneously; for the overall representation of Golden Age in Acharnians see Olson 2002: lii-liii), Ar. Pl. 1190, Telecl. fr. 1 (esp. l. 3: αὐτόματ' ἦν τὰ δέοντα: all things that were necessary were supplied automatically; cf. Bagordo 2013: 59–60), Pherecr. frr. 113 and 137, Eup. fr. 315 (from the play Χρυσοῦν Γένος - Golden Age), Metag. fr. 6 (cf. Orth 2014: 415–426), Cratin. frr. 172, 176, and 363, Nicopho fr. 21, Theopomp. fr. 39, Crates fr. 17.7, sch. on Ar. Ach. 1026 (where ἐν πᾶσιν ἀγαθοῖς is considered synonymous to ἐν πᾶσῃ τρυφῇ, i. e. implying excess luxury and refinement), etc. Precise time and exact location of these utopia visualisations purposely remain vague and indeterminate. The majority of these passages are quoted by Athenaeus 6.267e-270a, in a section where the banqueters engage in a discussion περὶ τοῦ ἀρχαίου βίου (life in ancient times). See further Baldry 1953 and Wilkins (2000) 115–123. Apart from these comic fragments/passages, there is a number of play-titles suggesting a mythological theme, situated in the Golden Age era, just like Amphis' Uranus; e. g. Phrynichus' Κρόνος (Cronus; PCG 7,399), Eubulus' Τιτᾶνες (Titans; PCG 5,254f.; Hunter (1983: 208) considers it a plausible burlesque of Τιτανομαχία), Cratinus Jr.'s Γίγαντες (Gigants) and Τιτᾶνες (Titans; PCG 4,338f. and 4,342 respectively). In addition, in Cratinus' Πλοῦτοι (Gods of Wealth; PCG 4,204–213), the Titans feature as speaking characters (fr. 171; cf. Bakola 2010: 208–220). Regarding the play-titles, it might be argued that the Golden Age topos seemingly extends to Middle Comedy (i. e. the three cases by Eubulus and Cratinus Jr.), but we have no Middle Comedy fragment actually exemplifying a utopia and confirming the continuation of this trend in the fourth century. Instead, comic utopias set in a distant past occur exclusively in Old Comedy (cf. also Epich. fr. 41); and they often serve as allegories for contemporary political affairs (cf. Wilkins 2000: 122–123). Remarkably, Amphis' present case is the only known example of this trend outside the period of Old Comedy. Amphis' originality should not be a reason not to accept the current interpretation as valid. On the contrary, this is yet another piece of evidence regarding Comedy's continuity and coherence that can be attested not only in the major trends, but also in multiple minor issues (cf. Papachrysostomou 2012–2013a). Besides, Amphis demonstrated similar interest in this trend on utopias elsewhere in his work (e. g. frr. 9 and 38; most intriguing is fr. 43, which seems to complement the utopian landscape drawn in the present fragment; cf. "Interpretation" ad loc.). It is likely that the play's structure and plot-line adhered (to an undeterminable extent) to the stereotypical – for Middle Comedy – pattern of myth burlesque in combination with constant intertwinement of mythical tradition with contemporary reality (cf. Intro. 4 "Themes & Motifs"). The present fragment, despite its minute size, contains the essential elements that suffice to qualify it as a (compact) case of a comic utopia (directly related to the myth/age of Cronus; cf. the play-title), i. e. (i) copious provision of food and (ii) automation. The first prerequisite is present in the notion of being fed until evening with all kinds of foodstuffs; the second prerequisite is strongly implied by the combination of the passive voice participle and the absence of a named agent, which create an explicit effect of automation. Most importantly, the cornucopia context is emphatically confirmed by the concluding phrase πάντα ἀγαθά, a give-away phrase which (as mentioned above) is typically present in Golden Age utopias. With all probability, Amphis' present fragment is a glimpse of a comic utopia scene; the only known example of this trend outside the Old Comedy period.

Metre Line 2 features a distinctive case of resolution that results in a dactyl (–⏑⏑) consisting of parts of two words (πᾶσιν ἀ-). This is a common phenomenon in Comedy, the details of which are thoroughly analysed by White (1912) §§ 107–111.

1a εἰς τὴν ἑσπέραν The current temporal meaning of the preposition εἰς with accusative specifically designates the notion of limit of time, entailing a certain duration; i. e. until / up to the evening. The notion of limit, though less frequently attested in our sources than the notion of point of time (e. g. Ar. Pl. 998, X. An. 3.1.3, etc.), is substantiated in Amphis' fragment by the present tense of the participle χορταζόμενα, which communicates a strong sense of duration. Cf. e. g. Hdt. 1.52 (et alibi) ἐς ἐμέ (up to my time); see LSJ[9] s. v. II.1.

1b χορταζόμενα The verb χορτάζω means to feed / fodder – with intention to fatten. The (somewhat less common) usage of this verb in passive voice (χορτάζομαι: to be fed) is the reason why Athenaeus cites the present fragment (cf. "Citation Context"), along with Cratin. fr. 149, Sophil. fr. 7.2, and Men. fr. 353 (Ath. 3.99f-100a); see also Arist. fr. 107, Thphr. CP 4.9.1 χορτασθέντα πυρῶν; cf. LSJ[9] s. v.

By and large, the passive voice communicates a sense of inertia on the subject's behalf; here this inertia combines with the verb's meaning (feeding) and creates an air of idleness / laziness (intertwined with indulgence). From this point of view, Amphis' fragment is closely paralleled by Cratin. fr. 149, a passage that also features χορτάζομαι in passive, within a context of a daylong feast: ἦσθε πανημέριοι χορταζόμενοι γάλα λευκόν / πυὸν δαινύμενοι, κἀμπιμπλάμενοι πυριάτῃ (you sat here all day, getting fat on white milk, dining on beestings, and filling yourselves with creamed cheese).

The verb χορτάζομαι can take an object (i) in the genitive, e. g. Arist. fr. 107 στεμφύλων χορτασθέντες (fed on grape pomace), Thphr. CP 4.9.1 χορτασθέντα πυρῶν (having eaten their fill of wheat); and (ii) in the accusative, e. g. Cratin. fr. 149 χορταζόμενοι γάλα λευκόν (see above). Regarding the active form of the verb (χορτάζω), this typically takes an indirect object in the dative along with a direct object in the accusative; e. g. Ar. Pax 139 τούτοισι τοῦτον χορτάσω (I'll fodder him with these), Ath. 3.100b πληγαῖς σε χορτάσω (I'll fodder you with blows). In the present fragment, χορταζόμενα is accompanied by the dative ἀγαθοῖς, which should be interpreted as an instrumental dative (and not as the object, since the participle is in passive voice).

Regarding the unknown subject of the participle χορταζόμενα, this should accordingly be of plural number and neuter gender; so the possibility of men (ἄνδρες) or people (ἄνθρωποι) is ruled out. Since the subject must denote something that can be fed, a likely hypothesis is τὰ βοτά, i. e. (farm) animals; the term occurs frequently in poetry, e. g. epic (Hom. Il. 18.521), lyric poetry (Semon. fr. 1.4), tragedy (A. Ag. 1169; S. Aj. 145, 231, 324; E. Hipp. 75), comedy (Ar. Nu. 1427, Cratin. fr. 181), and occasionally in prose (Pl. Mx. 237d).

2 πᾶσιν ἀγαθοῖς Here ἀγαθά means good things, dainties, tasty foodstuffs; cf. Ar. Ach. 873, 976, 980; Eq. 1218; Thgn. 1000, etc. The expression πᾶσιν ἀγαθοῖς serves as a key piece of evidence that substantiates the hypothesis of a comic utopia context for the present fragment. Such utopian contexts in Comedy are universally defined by a preposterous abundance of delicacies of every sort, stereotypically phrased as πάντα ἀγαθά; cf. "Interpretation".

Πάν (Pan)
("Pan")

Discussion Edmonds 2,324f.; PCG 2,226; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 303

Title The title belongs in Amphis' mythological repertoire and explicitly suggests a mythological theme (or, at least, a mythological background) for the present play. But, as typically happens in Middle Comedy, the mythical tradition may have been not only innovatively reshaped and extensively burlesqued, but also imaginatively enriched with real life elements and constantly intruded by contemporary figures (cf. Intro. 4 "Themes & Motifs"); the non-mythological content of the play's one surviving fragment corroborates that. The comic playwright Timostratus (second century BC) also wrote a play called Πάν (PCG 7,785), while both Araros and Philiscus wrote plays entitled The Birth of Pan (Πανὸς γοναί; PCG 2,529 and 7,357 respectively).

Pan, son of Hermes (though there are multiple versions regarding his parentage), was a strange and uncanny god, in many ways. His appearance was most arresting; half-man (upper part) and half-goat (lower part), ithyphallic, with horns and a pine wreath on his head, and a pointed bearded chin. His cult originated in the Arcadian[18] mountains and spread to the rest of the Greek world during the fifth century BC. Shortly before 490 BC his cult was already established in Athens, where a cave-shrine was dedicated to him on the northern slope of the Acropolis. Equally renowned was the shrine of Pan and the Nymphs in the Attic deme of Phyle. Pan was considered protector of shepherds and their flocks, of all inhabitants of mountain and forest areas, as well as of soldiers positioned in isolated spots. Still, his sudden apparition and loud cry were believed to cause irrational fear (panic) to both wayfarers and soldiers. He was believed to enhance fertility (of land, livestock, and women) and had explicit erotic/sexual associations; accordingly, several myths about him are of an amorous nature (e.g. the pursuits of the nymphs Syrinx and Echo, and the moon-goddess Selene). See h. Hom. Pan.; Pi. fr. 95; Hdt. 2.145, 6.105–106; Pl. Cra. 408b-d, Lg. 815c, Phd. 263d, 279b; Theoc. 1.123–130, 7.106–108; Apollod. 1.4.1, Epit. 7.38; Plu. 419b-c; Paus. 8.36.8, 42.2–3, 54.6–7, 10.23.7; Ovid Met. 1.689–712, 11.146–179, 14.635–641; Virg. Geor. 1.17, 3.391–3.

Pan features in Comedy on various occasions and for different reasons. In Menander's Dyscolus Pan famously delivers the prologue speech (and arranges the erotic union of the young couple), while his Phyle shrine features in the background (for the necessary scenery adaptations see Handley 1965: 24–25). In Aristophanes' Lysistrata there are repeat allusions to the sexual associations of the god: ll. 2, 721, 911, 998. Cf. Ar. Av. 745, Th. 977, Ec. 1069; Cratin. fr. 359; etc.

[18] Based on Pan's Arcadian associations, Edmonds (2,325) dates Amphis' play to the time of the Arcadian alliance (366 BC) or a little later.

fr. 29 (29 K.)

ἀτελὲς δὲ δεῖπνον οὐ ποιεῖ παροινίαν ἀτελὲς δὲ δεῖπνον Schweighaeuser: ἀτ- γὰρ δ- A: ἀτ- (superscr. εὐ) δ- CE: δ- γὰρ εὐτ- Casaub.: δ- γὰρ ἀτ- Kock

An inexpensive dinner does not lead to drunken behaviour

Ath. 10.421a
παραιτητέον εἰς ταῦτ' ἀποβλέποντάς ἐστι τὸ γαστρίζεσθαι (haec om. CE)· ἀτελὲς — παροινίαν, ὡς Ἄμφις φησὶν ἐν Πανί (ὡς et ἐν Π. om. CE).

Paying attention to these, we must refrain from stuffing ourselves; for: "An — behaviour", as Amphis says in "Pan".

Metre Iambic trimeter
⏑⏑–⏑– ⏑|–⏑– ⏑–⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)

Discussion Meineke 3,312; Bothe 485; Kock 2,244; Edmonds 2,324f.; PCG 2,226; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 303

Citation Context The fragment is quoted as part of a series of passages that display aspects of excessive consumption of food and wine at dinner-parties, and serves (always within Athenaeus' text) as a piece of advice against such extravagance. Beginning with a question on Heracles' gluttony (Ἡρακλέους ἀδηφαγία) at the end of Book 9, in Book 10 the banqueters engage in a lengthy and wide-reaching discussion about gluttony. One of the aspects they discuss is the unnecessary and ostentatious extravagance often displayed at dinner-parties, which usually leads to verbal abuse and/or violent behaviour towards the slaves as well as among the banqueters. Dinner-parties evolving into brawls is a topos in Comedy, and generally in Greek literature (cf. "Interpretation").

Μέγα γὰρ ἀνθρώποις κακὸν ἡ γαστήρ (the belly causes people tremendous trouble); says Athenaeus (10.422a), as he quotes, alongside Amphis' fragment, a number of parallel passages featuring the unpleasant effects of παροινία and/or immoderate dining; e. g. Alex. frr. 160, 183 and 215 (cf. Arnott 1996:

471, 613–614), Diph. frr. 45 and 60, E. fr. 213, etc. For the seeming incongruity of Mnesim. fr. 7 in this context (ap. Ath. 10.421b-c), which is a braggadocio of a warlike speaker and his companions dining on weapons, see Murray 1991 and Papachrysostomou (2008) 210–216.

Although Athenaeus uses Amphis' words as a piece of advice against excess in symposia, it does not necessarily follow that this was also the original function of this line within Amphis' play; cf. "Constitution of Text".

Constitution of Text The introductory phrase (παραιτητέον – γαστρίζεσθαι) is left out by the Epitome codices C and E (cf. Intro. 3 "Tradition & Reception"). The same two codices also leave out the play's title (ἐν Πανί) and the conjunction ὡς. The text as printed (ἀτελὲς δὲ δεῖπνον) is the result of Schweighaeuser's felicitous emendation (Animadv. ad loc.). Instead of δέ, codex A preserves the reading γάρ, which produces a longum in the third position of the first iambic metre. Codices C and E omit γάρ and, thus, produce an unmetrical, incomplete line. Schweighaeuser replaced A's γάρ with δέ, which gives a brevis as the third element of the iambic metre, as needed. It is highly probable that either Athenaeus or the scribe of codex A (John the Calligrapher) interpolated γάρ in Amphis' text, in order to explain the reasoning developed by the speaker; i. e. Amphis' words are used as an authoritative piece of evidence in favour of the speaker's argument (to refrain from excessive eating, παραιτητέον γαστρίζεσθαι). In codices C and E there is a superscript note, εὐ (i. e. providing for εὐτελές), above ἀτ- (ἀτελές). Regarding Casaubon's and Kock's suggestions, they both result in a metrically correct line, though by transposition of word order. Schweighaeuser's emendation is preferred as the one healing the metre through minimum modification of the manuscript tradition.

Interpretation The present fragment forms part of a far-reaching discourse on extravagant dining in ancient Greek literature. The speaker (whose identity is beyond recovery) maintains that an inexpensive dinner-party cannot and does not lead to drunkenness and violent behaviour. For, whenever food and wine are available in moderate quantities (rather than in excess), the guests will accordingly eat and drink sensibly. In general, consumption and self-control (ἐγκράτεια) were major causes of anxiety for ancient Greeks, and this is often reflected across the genres through various discussions about luxury and extravagant forms of dining; cf. Hill (2011) 43–62, 81–102; Wilkins (2000) 257–311; Dalby (1995) 93–129. Within this context, the imagery of dinner-parties going awry and ending up in brawls is rather frequent in Comedy and elsewhere. Caution against excessive drinking is already recommended by Theognis (e. g. 479–487, 500–510). Although Cratinus produces an entire play of self-satire based on his fondness of wine (Πυτίνη, Wine flask;

cf. Bakola 2010: 59–63), the archetypical drunken – violent figure is Philocleon in Aristophanes Wasps. Philocleon is described with the hapax superlative adjective παροινικώτατος (utterly drunk and disorderly; l. 1300) and his unruly behaviour is reported by the slave Xanthias in ll. 1299–1325; he stuffs himself up with food, consumes more wine than any other guest, gets utterly drunk, and – subsequently – excels in misbehaviour: he steals a pipe-girl out of the party, tries to convince her to have sex with him, and absurdly attempts to pass her off as a torch to his infuriated son (ll. 1341–1379). The παροινικώτατος Philocleon also exhibits various kinds of slapstick; he makes a clown of himself (1305), insults the other guests (1320), tells gross stories (1320–1321), and ends up beating anyone who happens to be in his way (1323). Philocleon's tomfoolery has exerted much influence on later literature. Lucian's Symposium or The Lapiths is a lengthy example of παροινία (drunken and disorderly behaviour), as well as a grotesque display of philosophers' gluttony and boorish eating manners (see Männlein 2000). See also Eub. fr. 93 (cf. Hunter 1983: 185–186); Plu. 656c-e; Luc. Tim. 54–55; Hld. 5.29; Alciphr. 3.19, 2.15, 2.30 (cf. Anderson 1993: 72).

The fragment's sober tone is contrasted by Amphis frr. 33 and 41 (see comm. ad loc.).

ἀτελές This is another instance of Amphis' penchant for the linguistically unusual and rare (cf. Intro 6. "Language"). The adjective ἀτελής has several meanings (cf. LSJ[9] s. v.), but this is the only occurrence of this term which survives in context meaning not costly / inexpensive. Hesychius (α 8043) interprets the term ἀτελῆ as ἀδάπανα, οὐκ ἔχοντα τελέσματα (without expense, without payments), and refers to Sophocles' Thyestes as an example; unfortunately, this word (ἀτελῆ) survives as a single-word fragment, without any further context (S. fr. 268, TrGF 4,246). There is also a much later testimony by Eustathius (ad Il. 3.315.10–13): πολυσήμαντον τὸ τέλος ἐστί … καὶ ἐκ μὲν τοῦ δηλοῦντος τὸ ἀνάλωμα γίνεται ἀτελῆ κατὰ Παυσανίαν τὰ ἀδάπανα, ὡς καὶ πολυτελῆ τὰ πολυδάπανα (the term "telos" has many meanings … from its meaning as "expense", there results the term "atelē" that means "without expense", according to Pausanias, just as the term "polutelē" means "expensive"); Eustathius draws on the lexicon of Pausanias the Grammarian (second century AD), α 166.

παροινίαν Athenaeus notes (10.444b): τὸ γὰρ παροινεῖν ἐκ τοῦ μεθύειν γίνεται (boorish behaviour results from drunkenness). The term παροινία designates the disorderly – and potentially violent – behaviour, as a result of excessive consumption of wine and drunkenness. It was universally considered to be a reprehensible attitude, not so much because of the violence it could entail, but because of the excess and the lack of self-control that lie at its core. Excessive wine-drinking forms part of a widespread and disquieting discourse that permeates Greek literature and is manifested in various genres and forms; cf. "Interpretation". The term παροινία and its cognates (παροινέω, παροινικός, etc.) feature regularly in Comedy, e. g. Ar. fr. 260, Ach. 979, V. 1300 (παροινικώτατος; see above), Ec. 143; Aristopho fr. 5; Antiph. fr. 42; Men. Dysc. 93; cf. "Citation Context". Nevertheless, excessive and uncontrollable consumption of wine followed by rowdy behaviour should never be confused with sensible intoxication, which was not only acceptable, but also consciously sought for, as a key element of proper social intercourse that enabled both self-affirmation and group bonding; cf. Osborne 2014 and 2007, Murray 1994b. It is this advantageous intoxication that is being championed by the speaker in Amphis fr. 33 and fr. 41 (ubi vide).

Πλάνος (Planos)
("The Itinerant Showman")

Discussion Kock 2,244; Edmonds 2,326f.; PCG 2,227; Papachrysostomou 88

Title The term πλάνος can denote the aimlessly wandering vagabond, the impostor, the swindler, but it can also designate the wandering juggler, the showman, someone who travels from one town to the next performing tricks, for which he possibly gets paid by the amused passers-by; i. e. something similar to busking. Although this is an unparalleled play-title[19] and despite the fact that the play's surviving fragments bear no relation to the title-figure, elsewhere in Comedy we learn the names (and tricks) of two such itinerant showmen, Cephisodorus (Dionys.Com. fr. 4, Nicostr.Com. fr. 25) and Pantaleon (Theognet. fr. 2); the relevant comic fragments are quoted by Athenaeus 14.615e-616a in a discussion περὶ τῶν καλουμένων πλάνων (about those known as "planoi"); elsewhere Athenaeus calls Cephisodorus and Pantaleon ἔνδοξοι πλάνοι (1.20a; famous itinerant showmen). Both the comic poet Theognetus (PCG 7,696) and the juggler Pantaleon (PAA 764430) lived during the third century BC. On the contrary, Cephisodorus (PAA 568055) was active during the fourth century BC, as were the poets Dionysius (early second half of the fourth century[20]), Nicostratus (first half of the fourth century; PCG 7,74), and Amphis (cf. Intro. 2 "Chronology / Career"). It is tempting, though unprovable, to assume that Amphis dealt with his rough contemporary Cephisodorus. But in the absence of all evidence, this should remain a hypothetical assumption; instead, Amphis' play could have centred on any (contemporary/historic or fictitious) figure of an itinerant showman.

fr. 30 (30 K.)

πρὸς τοὺς στρατηγοὺς ῥᾷόν ἐστιν μυρίαις μοίραις προσελθόντ' ἀξιωθῆναι λόγου λαβεῖν τ' ἀπόκρισιν <ὧν> ἂν ἐπερωτᾷ τις ἢ πρὸς τοὺς καταράτους ἰχθυοπώλας ἐν ἀγορᾷ.
5 οὓς ἂν ἐπερωτήσῃ τις <ἀνα>λαβών τι τῶν

---

[19] Edmonds (2,326f.) considers Amphis' present play as the original of Livius Andronicus' Ludius.

[20] Dionysius won one victory at the Lenaea between 339 and 332 BC (IRDF 2325E.53).

παρακειμένων, ἔκυψεν ὥσπερ Τήλεφος πρῶτον σιωπῇ (καὶ δικαίως τοῦτό γε· ἅπαντες ἀνδροφόνοι γάρ εἰσιν ἑνὶ λόγῳ), ὡσεὶ προσήκων δ' οὐδὲν οὐδ' ἀκηκοὼς ἔκρουσε πουλύπουν τιν'· ὁ δ' ἐπρήσθη <μόλις> <×—⏑— ×> καὶ τότ' οὐ λαλῶν ὅλα τὰ ῥήματ', ἀλλὰ συλλαβὴν ἀφελὼν "τάρων βολῶν γένοιτ' ἄν·" "ἡ δὲ κέστρα;" "κτὼ βολῶν."
τοιαῦτ' ἀκοῦσαι δεῖ τὸν ὀψωνοῦντά τι

3 nil nisi ἢ CE ὧν ἂν Porson: ἀν A 4 post hunc versum defic. CE 5 ἂν Mus.: ἐὰν A ἐπερωτήσῃ τις † λαβών PCG 2,227: ἐπερωτήσῃ τις λαβών A: ἐρωτ- τις <ἀνα>λαβών Kock: an ἐπερωτήσῃς <ἐθέλων> λαβεῖν ('emere')? Kassel (1954) 9 προσήκων δ' ipsa: προσέχων δ' A: ὡσεὶ † προσέχων δ' † K-A: τε προσέχων Meineke (1823) 186: δὲ πρ. Dindorf: προσῆκον δ' Kaibel CGF 10 πουλύπουν Meineke: πώλυπον A ὁ δ' ἐπρήσθη <μόλις> ipsa: ὁ δ' ἐπρήσθη (lac. ⏑—) A: ὁ δ' ἐπρίσθη Meineke: del. Kock: ὁ δὲ π<άλιν "πόσου;" / φησίν· ὁ δ' ἐπ>ρήσθη Taillardat p. 189 ὁ δ' αὖ / μόλις ἀνακύπτει ipsa (2008) 94 11 καὶ τότ' οὐ A: κοὐ Kock, priori versui post τινὰ continuans 12 τάρων Mus.: τεττάρων A 13 init. βολῶν Schweigh.: ὀβ- A κτὼ Meineke: ὀκτὼ A

It is infinitely easier to come before the generals and obtain a hearing and receive an answer to whatever one inquires about, than it is to approach the damned fishmongers in the market.
Whenever someone, picking up something of the wares on display, asks them a question, he hangs his head like Telephus in silence first (and they do this with reason; for, to put it in a word, they are all murderers), and, as if he had nothing to do with it, nor had he heard a word, he pounds an octopus, which tenses up a little.
… and then, without pronouncing his words entire, but clipping some syllables, "It would cost you fo' obols". "And this barracuda?" "Eigh' obols".
This is what a fish-buyer must hear

Ath. 6.224d-e
Ἄμφις δ' ἐν Πλάνῳ (δέ φησι CE)· πρὸς —— τι

Amphis in "The Itinerant Showman": "It —— hear"

Metre Iambic trimeter

1. ––⏑– –|–⏑– ⏑–⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
2. ––⏑– –|–⏑– ––⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
3. ⏑–⏑– ⏑⏑|–⏑⏑ ––⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
4. ––⏑⏑ –|–⏑⏑– ⏑⏑⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
5. –⏑⏑– ––⏑|⏑ ⏑–⏑– (hephthemimeral caesura)
6. ⏑⏑–⏑– ⏑–⏑|– ––⏑– (hephthemimeral caesura)
7. ––⏑– –|–⏑– ––⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
8. ⏑–⏑– ⏑⏑–⏑|– ⏑⏑⏑– (hephthemimeral caesura)
9. ––⏑– –|–⏑– ⏑–⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
10. ––⏑– ⏑–⏑|⏑ ––⏑– (hephthemimeral caesura)
11. ×–⏑– ×|–⏑– ⏑–⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
12. ⏑–⏑– ⏑|–⏑– ⏑⏑–⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
13. ⏑–⏑– ⏑|–⏑– ⏑–⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
14. ––⏑– –|–⏑– ––⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)

Discussion Meineke 3,312–315; Bothe 485f.; Kock 2,244f.; Edmonds 2,326f.; PCG 2,227f.; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 303f.; Papachrysostomou 88–95

Citation Context As the dinner-party narrated by Athenaeus to Timocrates proceeds, fish – in large quantities – are served at some point (6.224b). This triggers an evaluation of the fish-sellers in Rome, who are described as not much different from those in Attica, who were attacked once upon a time in comedy (οὐδ᾽ ὀλίγον ἀποδέουσι τῶν κατὰ τὴν Ἀττικήν ποτε κωμῳδηθέντων); and there follows an accumulative quotation of eighteen comic fragments (mostly from Middle and New Comedy), all of which criticize the fishmongers – more or less seriously – as a group of greedy crooks and/or target some (fraudulent) aspect of their business (6.224c-228b). Amphis' present fragment is the second fragment in this series; it is preceded by Antiph. fr. 164, and followed (in order of citation in Athenaeus' text) by Alex. fr. 16 (cf. "Interpretation" below), Diph. fr. 67, Xenarch. fr. 7, Antiph. frr. 159 and 217, Alex. frr. 204, 130 and 131, Antiph. fr. 157, Diph. fr. 32, Alex. fr. 76, Archipp. fr. 23, Anaxandr. fr. 34, Alex. fr. 78, Diph. fr. 31, and Sophil. fr. 2. For a brief analysis of this sustained attack against fishmongers cf. "Interpretation" below.

Constitution of Text This fragment features several critical issues. To begin with, most of the text is preserved only by Athenaeus' codex A (cf. Intro. 3 "Tradition & Reception"); codices C and E preserve only ll. 1–2 and l. 4. From l. 3 codices C and E preserve only the final ἢ. To resolve the metrical problem of l. 3 (as preserved by codex A), Porson (Misc. 237) inserted the relative pronoun ὧν (that covers the line's third longum); Porson also added a grave accent on the following ἂν. In l. 5 Musurus corrected A's ἐὰν into ἂν, thus removing a superfluous brevis element. The rest of l. 5 is also problematic, as preserved by codex A. Kassel-Austin print A's unmetrical text, with a crux; however, we can effectively remedy the problem by combining A's text with Kock's suggestion and read ἀναλαβών (instead of A's λαβών), assuming that the preposition ἀνά has been lost by haplography (on prepositions' "mobility" in the manuscript tradition see West 1973: 24). The verb ἀναλαμβάνω means (primarily) take up, take into one's hands, pick up (cf. LSJ[9] s. v.); i. e. it is semantically extremely close to the simplex λαμβάνω (take hold of, grasp), preserved by codex A; hence, ἀναλαβών semantically suits the context (i. e. the customer picks up a fish and asks for its price). Line 9 is a peculiar case, as preserved by codex A; the line features a comparative participial clause and, though it makes perfect sense as a parenthetical comment, is metrically incomplete (the anceps of the second metre is missing). Both Meineke's and Dindorf's suggestions, despite settling the metrical issue, produce an unsound meaning; Meineke's τε and Dindorf's δὲ (both meant to follow the initial ὡσεὶ) do not correspond to anything and are clearly redundant to the meaning. The verbs ἔκυψεν (l. 6) and ἔκρουσε (l. 10) are connected via an asyndetic syntactical structure; in theory, a conjunction (such as Meineke's τε or Dindorf's δὲ) might be used / added (if needed) to connect the two verbs, but this can by no means be the case here, since the conjunction τε or δὲ is meant to be placed within the comparative clause; hence, it cannot refer syntactically to anything outside this clause. As far as Kaibel's conjecture is concerned, this solves the metrical issue but fails to account for the neuter gender of the participle (προσῆκον). But if we change the gender to masculine, the metre is still satisfied and the meaning is impeccable; the participle (προσήκων) refers to the fishmonger who arrogantly refuses to get actively involved in a dialogue with the client (for the use of the verb προσήκω with οὐδέν see Pl. R. 539d). In line 10 codex A preserves the reading πώλυπον. But the form πώλυπος / πῶλυψ (nom. sg.) is mostly Doric (cf. Epich. frr. 54, 122); so Meineke changes it into πουλύπουν, thus removing a Doric type from a text written in Attic dialect. The second half of the line, after the semicolon, is also problematic featuring a lacuna at the end of the line. Assuming that the subject of ἐπρήσθη is the octopus (see comm. s. v.), I added the adverb μόλις, which covers the final two missing elements (brevis + longum); for μόλις positioned at line-end cf. Ar. Pax 875, Alex. fr. 271.5, E. Hel. 1269. Meineke prefers to write ἐπρίσθη, assuming the simplex verb is πρίω (grind the teeth). In a sweeping approach Kock deletes everything that is after the semicolon in l. 10, as well as the initial lacuna in l. 11 (×—⏑— ×). Taillardat (1962: 189) suggests a fully metrical, though fairly imaginative, supplement for ll. 10–11. For this same lacuna I suggested the supplement ὁ δ' αὖ / μόλις ἀνακύπτει in my 2008 monograph (p. 94); although this provides a satisfying meaning (the fishmonger finally looks at the customer and starts paying attention to him, before answering his question in ll. 12–13), I now refrain from adopting this supplement, for the present tense ἀνακύπτει abruptly terminates the sequence of gnomic aorists (ἔκυψεν, ἔκρουσε, ἐπρήσθη); see comm. s. v. ἔκυψεν. Lines 12–13 probably provide the most demonstrative evidence regarding the (lack of good) knowledge of Greek of John the Calligrapher, the scribe of Codex A (see Arnott 2000, and discussion under Amphis' Erithoi). Codex A preserves in full the readings τεττάρων, ὀβολῶν, and ὀκτώ, whereas it has just been made clear in the text that the fishmonger cuts certain syllables as he speaks (συλλαβὴν ἀφελών). John the Calligrapher added the initial missing syllables (τε- , ὀ- , and ὀ-), thinking he was correcting some corrupted readings. In addition to the meaning, the metre is also disturbed if we add the "missing" syllables. Hence, Musurus, Schweighaeuser, and Meineke were right to remove the first syllable from τεττάρων, ὀβολῶν, and ὀκτώ respectively, resulting in the text as printed (featuring τάρων, βολῶν, and κτώ).

Interpretation The fragment is a caustic satire against fishmongers and presents striking similarities (verbal and situational) with Alex. fr. 16. In both fragments the speaker accuses the fishmongers (i) of immoderate and undeserved arrogance, as he compares their attitude to that of the Generals, whose haughtiness is considered less intense (than the fishmongers') and is (implicitly in Amphis and explicitly in Alexis) justified; and (ii) of charging exorbitantly high prices. To evince his points the comic character cites a typical dialogue between a fishmonger and a client; for a discussion of Amphis' and Alexis' convergence see Arnott (1996) 98–99 and Nesselrath (1990) 294.

The fragment belongs to a key thematic trend of the Middle and New Comedy periods; namely, the extremely sharp and almost hostile satire against fish-sellers (for a quasi-similar satire against hetairai see "Interpretation" for Amphis fr. 23). This satire primarily focuses on the thorny question of money and portrays fish-sellers as wicked and arrogant individuals who charge preposterously high prices for their ware and use scheming ways to deceive their clients. A significant number of relevant comic fragments are collected by Athenaeus 6.224c-228b (cf. "Citation Context"); Ar. fr. 402, Antiph. fr. 204, and Arched. fr. 3 are to be added to Athenaeus' list. It is difficult to establish the origin of this comic trend with certainty; Arnott (1996: 98) suggests a possible link with the food shortage in Athens in 320s (though this date is fairly late and fails to account for the earlier manifestations of the motif, as in Amphis' present case; on Amphis' chronology / career see Intro. 2). Nesselrath (1990: 291) argues that Antiphanes was probably the first one to introduce this satirical pattern in Comedy.

Regardless of who was the first playwright to introduce this trend or what contemporary events triggered it (if any), the fishmongers become stereotypical figures in Middle and New Comedy, and so does the harsh satire against them. The comic poets repeatedly describe fishmongers as crooks and complain about the outrageously high fish prices. Eels in particular were proverbially expensive. Already in Aristophanes a single eel is priced at three drachmas (Ach. 962),[21] and some fifty years later, in Antiphanes' time, twelve drachmas are required just to catch a whiff of one (fr. 145); cf. comm. on Amphis fr. 35 s. v. ἐγχελύδιον. In Amphis' present fragment an octopus costs four obols and a barracuda eight obols. In Alex. fr. 16 the fishmonger prices a single mullet at ten obols, or else – suggesting a bargain – at eight obols each provided that the customer buys two of them. Another graphic example of outrageous fish prices can be found in Diph. fr. 32, where the speaker thinks of himself as paying ransom when he buys fish just like Priam ransomed Hector,[22] and reckons that Poseidon would have been the richest god, if only he received a small percentage of the transactions. Even earlier, in Eup. fr. 160, a comic character complains that he spent one hundred drachmas on fish, buying just eight sea-bass and a dozen giltheads. Bearing in mind that during the fourth century BC the remuneration for Athenian citizens participating in the Popular Assembly was between six and nine obols (depending on the kind of the Assembly, ordinary or sovereign), half a drachma (three obols) for attending the Courts, five obols for sitting at the Council of Five Hundred (cf. Arist. Ath. 62.2), and also that a daily wage of an unskilled labourer could hardly ever exceed the amount of two drachmas, it soon becomes clear that the fish prices mentioned by comic characters are noticeably and disproportionately high. For an exhaustive analysis of wages in Athens see Loomis 1998 passim.

Fish was typically considered a luxurious food item. Never a part of the sacrificial order, fish was bought and consumed at will, simply to satisfy desire (Davidson 1997: 11–20). Shopping for and consumption of fish becomes a comic topos. The implications and consequences for fish-lovers extend from receiving a nickname to property squandering and tyranny. Among fourth century politicians, Callimedon (PAA 558185) was nicknamed Κάραβος (Crayfish; Alex. fr. 57, Euphro fr. 8), and Callisthenes (PAA 559815) was said to be wasting his property in this sport (Antiph. fr. 27.9–11). Ostentatious consumption of expensive and large fish was widely considered an arrogant exhibition of wealth and power by the elite, a reversal of democratic equality, and an indication of tyrannical propensities. The stallholder's comment (Ar. V. 495) on a customer who prefers perch over sprats represents a feeling that was evidently widespread: οὗτος ὀψωνεῖν ἔοιχ' ἄνθρωπος ἐπὶ τυραννίδι (this man seems to be buying fish with an eye on tyranny). For a comprehensive discussion of fish consumption and its implications on both social and political levels see Davidson 1993 and 1995. Wilkins (2000: 164–175, 296–300) interprets Comedy's antipathy against fishmongers as part of the widespread dislike towards commercial dealings in general, whereas Paulas (2010) makes an elaborate case for a "bazaar economy" pattern (essentially defined by lack of both information and communication of information regarding the goods' prices and quality). Wilkins' and Paulas' approaches are not, necessarily, mutually exclusive.

---

[21] This statement is taken literally by both Oder (RE I.1 s. v. Aal) and Davidson (1997) 186–187. But Starkie (1909: 194) strongly disagrees.

[22] For the detail (not in Homer) see Σ^{A} Il. 22.351 citing Aeschylus (TrGF 3,365; and T 1,22 TrGF 3,33), according to whom Priam offered Achilles his son's weight in gold.

Comedy's testimonies about fish prices are supplemented by some inscriptional evidence (SEG XXXII 450) from the Hellenistic period, originating from Acraephia (Ἀκραιφία), a small city in Boeotia. There are factual difficulties in comparing the inscriptions' data with Comedy's testimonies (for a list of comic prices see Böckh 1886: 129); such as differences of time, place, and, more importantly, mode of price-quotation. Although it is hard to decide with certainty to what degree Comedy's prices reflect the reality of the market-place, it is reasonable to believe that, unless comic prices were close enough to the real ones, the poets' spite against the fishmongers would have been unsubstantiated and the frequent attacks against them would make no sense whatsoever to the contemporary audience. For an analytical study of this Hellenistic decree see Lytle 2010.

Within this large-scale satire (better say, attack) against fishmongers, Amphis' present fragment constitutes a highly conspicuous case, for this is the only passage where fishmongers are called ἀνδροφόνοι (man-slaying, murderers; cf. s. v. below); this is a most abusive term, which – along with καταράτους (l. 4) – reveals that the speaker is currently under a heightened emotional status, as he recalls and narrates an episode that he has probably experienced in the past. Cf. "Metre" below.

Metre It is noteworthy that this fragment features a remarkably high number of resolutions (of ancipitia, longa, and brevia); in total, twelve resolutions. Lines 3, 5, and 8 feature two resolutions each, while line 4 features three resolutions, one of which is a resolution of a brevis element. This accumulation of resolutions results in an overall tripping rhythm, which matches the speaker's tense emotional status, as he narrates this incident (most revealing of his anger are the abusive terms καταράτους and ἀνδροφόνοι that he employs). In l. 11 I apply a penthemimeral caesura, i. e. after the initial lacuna.

1 τοὺς στρατηγούς The Institution of the Ten Generals was introduced in Athens in 501 BC, as a crucial part of Cleisthenes' radical reform. Since this was an office that required expert knowledge and special / technical abilities (i. e. lead the army and/or the navy successfully to war), the Generals were elected (instead of being designated by drawing lots, like the majority of the public offices), one from each of the ten Cleisthenean tribes, for an annual service (Arist. Ath. 22.2, 44.4). During the fifth century BC the Generals wielded both political and military power. They were, along with orators (ῥήτορες), equivalent to the modern notion of "politicians" or "political leaders"; see Hansen (1983a) 37–42. The Generals presided over the People's Court in military cases (Lys. 15.1–4), enjoyed the privilege of addressing the Council and proposing motions without prior leave from the prytaneis (SEG 10 86.47, IG II^2 27), and represented the city of Athens in the case of a treaty (IG II^2 124.20–23). They also commanded the army and the fleet (Hdt. 6.103.1, X. HG 1.7.5), and appointed the trierarchs (D. 39.8). However, in the fourth century the status of the Generals was radically modified and their powers were significantly restricted; they were merely military commanders in chief, and a division of military duties was also introduced among them (Arist. Ath. 61.1). Military and state duties gradually ceased being performed by the same man, as in the cases of e. g. Pericles and Cimon (cf. Isocrates 8.54–55). The split though was not definite (see Hansen 1983a: 49–55). For a comprehensive discussion of the Generals and their role see Hansen (1991) 34–36, 233–237, 268–277, 343–347. See also De Ste Croix (2004) 215–228 and Hansen 1983b for an inventory of Generals (and orators) in fourth century Athens.

The present reference to "the Generals", generic as it is, does not allow for any particular identification with certain historic figures. Although the fishmongers are the main target of Amphis' satire, the Generals are also attacked, at least indirectly, for both arrogance and unwillingness to consent to a hearing (cf. comm. s. v. ἀξιωθῆναι λόγου). The comic jibe against the Generals traces back to Old Comedy, where it appears even sharper. In Acharnians (572ff.) Aristophanes portrays the General Lamachus as a corrupted and warlike opportunist who fattens himself from the city's military payroll (cf. esp. ll. 595–597); and, as such, he makes him stand collectively for all Generals (as well as other public figures) who seek to prolong the war for personal interest and profiteering; the appointment of Generals by election also comes under attack in this scene (ll. 598–619). Cf. also Ar. Eq. 355 (with ancient scholia), Pl.Com. fr. 201, Eup. frr. 219 and 384.

1–2 μυρίαις μοίραις This is an unparalleled expression featuring parechesis of the consonants -μ- and -ρ-. The speaker wishes to emphasize the huge difference between Generals and fishmongers and to demonstrate how much easier it is (ῥᾷόν ἐστιν) to have a word with the former group than with the latter. The expression μυρίαις μοίραις is closely paralleled by the dative case (μυρίῳ), which is occasionally used (in both poetry and prose) as an adverb meaning infinitely (cf. LSJ[9] s. v. I.4b); e. g. E. Andr. 701, Pl. Plt. 272c. Additionally, l. 555 from Aristophanes' Thesmophoriazusae might be considered a remotely comparable case: οὐδέπω τὴν μυριοστὴν μοῖραν ὧν ποιοῦμεν ([I haven't told] yet the one ten-thousandth part of what we do); yet, the similarity rests more with phraseology rather than with meaning.

The noun μοῖρα here means degree, as in later astronomical texts (LSJ[9] s. v. I.5; Hipparch. 1.8.17, Gem. 1.6, etc.). The numeral μυρίος,-α,-ον features dual accentuation (μύριος and μυρίος). According to Herodian the Grammarian (1.125) the proparoxytone form (μύριος) designates the definite numeral (ten thousand), whereas the paroxytone form (μυρίος) means countless, infinite, numberless: μύριος ὁ ὡρισμένος ἀριθμός, μυρίος ἀόριστος. However, this differentiation is not always observed in the manuscript tradition, so the accentuation is not a safe criterion for establishing the meaning (cf. LSJ[9] s. v.). The form featuring in the present fragment (μυρίαις; female plural dative) is identical for both the proparoxytone and the paroxytone forms.

2 ἀξιωθῆναι λόγου To be assigned the right of speaking / of a hearing; especially (though not exclusively) at a law-court; see D. 45.6. This λόγος could refer to a number of situations. One possibility – that is also compatible with the reference to the Generals – is a complaint about conscription. The Generals had the responsibility to produce call-up lists for military service; cf. Lys. 14.6, D. 39.8. We know of a particular instance, where an enrolled soldier did come before the Generals to complain about being called in the army again after hardly two months having passed since his previous conscription; this is Lysias' speech Ὑπὲρ τοῦ στρατιώτου (For the Soldier); see MacDowell 1993.

4 καταράτους Accursed, abominable. This is a widely used term of abuse that can be directed either against humans (as here, against the fishmongers; see also E. Med. 162–163 κατάρατον / πόσιν: abominable husband; cf. E. Hipp. 1362, Hec. 716) or against inanimate objects (Ar. V. 1157 καταράτους ἐμβάδας: accursed slippers). This term of abuse is common in Comedy of all eras; e. g. Ar. Pax 33, Lys. 930, Ec. 949; Pherecr. frr. 76.3, 155.8; Epicr. fr. 8.1; Philem. fr. 65.3; etc. Sophocles uses the superlative καταρατότατος (OT 1345), while Demosthenes and Menander employ (apart from the simplex) the more intense compound τρισκατάρατος (e. g. D. 25A 82; Men. Epit. 1080, fr. 71).

Demosthenes uses the term κατάρατος as an insult fairly often; e. g. 18.209 (see Wankel 1976: 967), 19.75, 21.164, 23.201, 24.107, etc.

5 τῶν The definite article is placed at the end of the line. This phenomenon recurs both in comedy (of all eras; though more often in Middle and New) and in tragedy, particularly in Sophocles. The most outstanding parallel cases are gathered by Arnott (1996) 111 (comm. on Alex. fr. 20.4), and van Leeuwen (1904) comm. on Ar. Pl. 752. Arnott l. c. suggests that this happens "as part of an attempt to make the iambic trimeter less stichic and more flexible". Taking Arnott's thought further, I would suggest that, especially in the case of comedy, the resulting fluidity of the line is meant to reflect and correspond to the real-life background of the scene (i. e. unlike art / comedy, real life can hardly obey rules – structural and other).

5–6 οὓς … ἔκυψεν Here the syntax is loose. Fishmongers are mentioned in the plural in a relative clause introduced by οὓς, but in the principal clause the number switches to singular (ἔκυψεν). The sequence of singular forms continues through the rest of the dialogue, with only one plural instance in the parenthetical phrase (ἅπαντες … εἰσιν). The peculiarity can be easily explained: the singular is indispensable for the construction of the dialogue, which focuses on a representative instantané (a single customer buys from and speaks to a single seller); but outside the dialogue's frame the fishmongers are considered collectively, as a group. A parallel crossing of numbers occurs in Ar. V. 552–558, Nu. 973–975, etc. See Kühner & Gerth ([4]1955) I §371.5; Maas (1958) §36.

6a παρακειμένων LSJ[9] (s. v. παράκειμαι) erroneously interpret the present occurrence of τὰ παρακείμενα as dishes on table, whereas it is obvious that the dialogue takes place over the fishmonger's stand in the market. Meineke (3,313) follows Casaubon in interpreting παρακείμενα as the fishmonger's professional instruments, i. e. knives, etc. However, it is rather inconceivable that a customer could have been interested in the fishmonger's professional tools (instead of the fish themselves), or could have ever interfered with them. The most appropriate interpretation seems to be Kock's (2,245), who understood παρακείμενα as the fish displayed nearby on the fishmonger's stand.

6b ἔκυψεν The present meaning of the verb κύπτω is to hang the head gazing downwards (cf. LSJ[9] s. v.). This posture is described elsewhere in parallel terms; e. g. ἔκυπτον (Euphro fr. 1.27), κάτω βλέποντας (Alex. fr. 16.6), κάτω κεκυφώς (Thphr. Char. 24.8). The reasons for assuming this posture vary (see Arnott 1996: 100). According to LSJ[9] s. v. 2, sorrow is the reason in Amphis' present fragment, but I highly doubt it, for there is no sign in the text to suggest it. Instead, I would argue that the fishmonger looks down (κύπτει) out of arrogance and contempt towards the customer (as is also the case in Alex. fr.

16). It could be that he affects to be preoccupied as an excuse for ignoring the customer, or else that he ignores the customer while leaning over to concentrate on his task, as if the customer was unimportant. The fishmonger is rude and uninterested, and pretends to be too busy to notice the customer; later (l. 10f.) he works on the octopus while answering.

The aorist ἔκυψεν is gnomic. It expresses a general truth, and a notion of regularity and recurrence (cf. Smyth 1956: §1931). This fragment features an accumulation of gnomic aorists (ἔκρουσε and ἐπρήσθη; l. 10), which communicate the impression that this is a stereotypical and recurrent dialogue scene between a fishmonger and a client.

6–8 ὥσπερ Τήλεφος … σιωπῇ … ἀνδροφόνοι The speechlessness of Telephus is a motif that recurs in Alex. fr. 183.3 ἄφωνος Τήλεφος (see Arnott 1996: 545–546) and originates from Aeschylus' play Μυσοί (Mysians; TrGF 3,257–259), where the mythic hero was bound to silence as a consequence of killing his mother's brothers (see Arist. Po. 1460ᵃ27–32, Hygin. Fab. 244). The satire of Telephus' silence by both Amphis and Alexis must reflect a fourth century revival of the Aeschylean play, according to the established practice (from 387/6 BC onwards) of re-performing an old tragedy at the City Dionysia; see Pickard-Cambridge (³1988) 72, 99–100 and Nervegna (2007) 15–21 (cf. the entry of Fasti for this year, IRDF 2318 fr. d, col. VIII.1009–1011). A speechless Telephus could not have come to Middle Comedy through Aristophanes, since Aristophanes modelled his satire not upon Aeschylus' Mysians but upon Euripides' Telephus; cf. e.g. Ach. 303–593 (see Olson 2002: liv-lxi), Th. 466–519, 689–759. See Handley & Rea (1957) 30–39. Generally, the association of speechlessness with murder is common; cf. e.g. E. fr. 1008 (TrGF 5.2,983), A. Eum. 448 and sch. on A. Eum. 276. See Parker (1983) 371.

The speaker in Amphis' fragment compares the silent treatment that the ἀνδροφόνος fishmonger gives his customer with the speechlessness of ἀνδροφόνος Telephus. It is typical for Comedy to play between metaphorical and literal. The epithet ἀνδροφόνος is Homeric (e.g. Il. 4.441 of Ares, 24.724 of Hector, 18.317 of Achilles: χεῖρες ἀνδροφόνοι, etc.); here the comic character uses the term metaphorically as a term of abuse, in order to portray the fishmongers as cunning, deceptive, and voracious. This epithet is not used by Aristophanes or by any other Middle Comedy poet apart from Amphis; it is employed though in New Comedy. In Philippid. fr. 5.3 the notorious hetaira Gnathaena is said to be ἀνδροφόνος (cf. Gow 1965: 8–9); in Euphro fr. 9.10 a cook instructs his assistant to be ἀνδροφόνος (ready to kill, i.e. to steal); and in Menander's Dyscolus Knemon uses the phrase ἀνδροφόνα θηρία (l. 481), as he rages against Getas. Additionally, Philemo and Bato wrote plays entitled Ἀνδροφόνος (yet, the identity of the title-figure is beyond recovery, for both cases). Other such extreme expressions occur elsewhere in Comedy; e. g. θεοισεχθρία in Archipp. fr. 37.3 and Ar. V. 418 (see van Leeuwen 1893: 51).

7–8 (καὶ δικαίως … ἑνὶ λόγῳ) These words are printed in parenthesis by Kassel & Austin (whom I follow), as a side comment by the same speaker. However, it is also possible that this is a case of antilabe, and these words actually belong to a second speaker (so Meineke 1823: 186). It is common for extended speeches to be interrupted – under various pretexts – for the purposes of variation; cf. e. g. Ar. Ach. 598, 607, Av. 464b, 553; Dionys.Com. fr. 2.36; Anaxandr. fr. 42.66–69.

10a ἔκρουσε ἔκρουσε is a gnomic aorist; see comm. s. v. ἔκυψεν. Prior to cooking, octopus needs to be vigorously beaten / pounded, in order to become tender and soft; cf. Sud. δ 1267 (= Phot. δ 668): ὁ πολύπους θηρευθεὶς τύπτεται πολλάκις πρὸς τὸ πίων γενέσθαι (when caught, the octopus is pounded repeatedly, in order to become plump). See Thompson (1947) 204–208. The verb commonly used to describe this practice is πιλέω; e. g. Ar. fr. 197 (πουλύπου πιλουμένου), Ephipp. fr. 3.10 (πιλεῖν τε πολλὰς πλεκτάνας ἐπιστρόφως: vigorously pound numerous octopus tentacles). The present usage of the verb κρούω (strike, smite) for the same purpose is unparalleled.

10b πουλύπουν The octopus. The form πουλύπους is the early, genuinely Attic version of the term, which remained in use until approximately the late fourth – early third century BC, when the alternative form πολύπους appears. See Arnott (1996) 514.

10c ἐπρήσθη This is the passive aorist of – primarily – the verb πρήθω (blow out, swell out), but also of the verb πίμπρημι (burn, burn up), which – apart from the present tense, the imperfect, and the infinitive – forms its tenses from πρήθω. The meaning of the text depends on which verb we choose, πρήθω or πίμπρημι. Apart from the different definitions, each verb presently necessitates a different agent as its subject. If we opt for πίμπρημι, we need to understand the burning notion as metaphorical; accordingly, the subject could be either the purchaser who is upset because of the fishmonger's attitude (so Kaibel CGF ad loc.) or the fishmonger himself who becomes increasingly impatient and furious as the customer keeps asking questions instead of making a purchase (so Taillardat 1962: 189). Alternatively, if we understand ἐπρήσθη to be the aorist of πρήθω (so Kuses 1890: 341, and Marx 1928: 185–186, comm. on Plaut. Rud. 1010), the subject is the octopus that swells up as a result of the pounding. In my translation above I assume the latter interpretation for a number of reasons. First and foremost (applying the Occam's razor principle), this is the most straightforward and the least complicated reconstruction of the text. As mentioned above (s. v. ἔκρουσε), octopuses are normally pounded, and swelling is a typical result of this procedure; cf. Sud. δ 1267 ὁ πολύπους τύπτεται πρὸς τὸ πίων γενέσθαι (the octopus is pounded in order to become plump). The verb ἐπρήσθη is understood in its literal sense (being the passive aorist of πρήθω), and the personal pronoun (ὁ δ') opportunely refers to the adjacent πουλύπουν.

On the contrary, the verb πίμπρημι would need to be understood metaphorically (burn up with rage). Not only is the metaphorical meaning of this verb extremely rare, but also in the existing parallels πίμπρημι takes the preposition ἐπί with the dative; LSJ[9] s. v. cite two examples: Luc. Jud. Voc. 8 (ἐπὶ τούτοις ἀγανακτῶ καὶ πίμπραμαι: I am indignant and burn with rage against them), and App. Ital. fr. 2 (ὁ Μάρκιος, πιμπράμενος ἐπὶ Ῥωμαίοις: Marcius, being inflamed against the Romans); apart from these two cases, I was unable to locate any other parallels. Yet, the application of both a rare metaphorical meaning and, subsequently, a syntactically unparalleled structure on πίμπρημι, are not the only counterarguments. Assuming that the subject of ἐπρήσθη (πίμπρημι) was the fishmonger, the syntactical structure of l. 10 would be problematic, given that the fishmonger is already the subject of ἔκρουσε; if the two verbs (ἔκρουσε and ἐπρήσθη) had the same subject, the interpolation of " ὁ δ' " between them would be not only unnecessary but also syntactically incorrect. The possibility of the customer being the subject of ἐπρήσθη is a precarious one. Before l. 10 the customer is only vaguely defined in the text as a grammatical entity (τις, l. 5); hence, he cannot be the obvious referent of the personal pronoun ὁ δ', especially when there are other more likely candidates for this (e. g. the adjacent πουλύπουν).

To sum up, for reasons of meaning, syntax, and grammar, I consider ἐπρήσθη to be the passive aorist of πρήθω, with octopus being its subject.

ἐπρήσθη is a gnomic aorist; see comm. s. v. ἔκυψεν.

12–13 τάρων … κτὼ βολῶν These lines feature both aphaeresis (κτὼ βολῶν) and syllable dropping (τάρων for τεττάρων). This is a glimpse of slang which is indicative of either the era in general or the market people in particular. Elsewhere in Comedy the words ὀκτὼ ὀϐολοί occur together in unelided form; e. g. Crates fr. 22 (featuring synecphonesis; cf. West 1982: 12–13) and Lynceus fr. 1.20. Threatte (1980: I.426) notes that aphaeresis is uncommon in Attic inscriptions. As to the syllables that are dropped, they share the following two characteristics: they are unaccented and short; (τε)ττάρων, (ὀ)ϐολῶν, (ὀ)κτώ. The omission of one of two syllables featuring the same or similar letters (as in τεττάρων) facilitates the pronunciation and makes the speech run quicker; see Lobeck (1837) 43, Sturtevant ([2]1940) 103, Tod (1947) 6–7. The dropping of unaccented and short syllables reccurs on some vase inscriptions (e. g. ΕΠΟΙΕΣΝ, ΑΘΕΝΕΘΝ); on these grounds, Kretschmer (1894) 124 suggests that this may have been a feature of the colloquial language of the era. Alternatively, such omissions, other similar oversights as well as serious errors (e. g. senseless strings of random letters) can be attributed simply to the inscriber's (varying degree of) illiteracy; cf. Vierneisel & Kaeser (1990) 90–95 (chapter by B. Fellmann, with further bibliography). Lorber (1979: esp. 95–108) discusses a number of idiosyncratic practices featuring on Corinthian vases (e. g. omission of letters, peculiar usage of articles, rare use of the genitive case, etc.).

The use of informal and colloquial language is best interpreted as another symptom of the fishmonger's dismissive attitude; see comm. s. v. ἔκυψεν. Yet, not only is the fishmonger rude, he is also expensive. As already mentioned, the high cost of fish forms the core of Comedy's attack against fishmongers in a number of passages, and this probably reflects reality. See detailed analysis in "Interpretation" above.

13a βολῶν Ὀβολός, obol. One obol equals eight chalkoi (χαλκοῦς) and one-sixth of drachma. See Tod 1947, Schaps (2004) 83–85.

13b κέστρα This is the Attic name of a fish otherwise known as σφύραινα (cf. LSJ[9] s. v.); cf. Stratt. fr. 29 (cf. Orth 2009: 156–157), Antiph. fr. 97, Ath. 7.323b. See Thompson (1947) 108, 256–257. The terms κέστρα and σφῦρα (> σφύραινα) mean hammer (cf. LSJ s. vv.); accordingly, both appellations of this fish species derive from its body-shape that closely resembles a hammer; see Boisacq ([4]1950) s. v. σφυρόν .

14 ὀψωνοῦντα The (fish-)buyer. Shopping for fish is a comic topos (cf. "Interpretation"). The verb ὀψωνέω derives from the noun ὄψον (cf. comm. on Amphis fr. 26 s. v.). Just as ὄψον means – primarily – fish, but also delicacy, any kind of prepared food / dish, similarly the verb ὀψωνέω means – primarily – to buy fish, but also to buy foodstuffs in general (cf. LSJ[9] s. v.). It is more than evident that the buyer of Amphis' present fragment is interested in buying specifically fish (rather than anything else). The verb ὀψωνέω is commonly used in Comedy (of all eras) with the determinate meaning of shopping for fish; e. g. Eup. fr. 156 τριχίδας ὠψώνησ' (he bought anchovies), Stratt. fr. 45 ὀψωνοῦσιν … φάγρους (they buy sea breams), Ar. V. 495 οὗτος ὀψωνεῖν ἔοιχ' ἄνθρωπος ἐπὶ τυραννίδι (this man seems to be buying fish with an eye on tyranny), Antiph. fr. 190 ὠψώνηκ' … ὑπογάστρι' (he has bought fish underbellies), Eub. fr. 87.3 ὀψοφάγος, ὀψωνῶν δὲ μέχρι τριωβόλου (a fish-lover [or: a glutton], but one who spends only three obols when he shops for fish [or: food]), Timocl. fr. 11.4 ὠψώνει (he was buying fish).

fr. 31 (31 K.)

x – παραδεδειπνημένος, παῖδες, πάλαι

παραδεδειπνημένος A: παραδεδειπνημένοι παῖδες Meineke 3,315, Bothe 486

Having been a parasite for a long time now, slaves

Ath. 10.423a
παραδεδειπνημένος δ' εἴρηκεν Ἄμφις ἐν Πλάνῳ οὕτως· παραδεδειπνημένος — πάλαι

Amphis uses the term "paradedeipnēmenos" in the "Itinerant Showman" as follows: "Having — Slaves"

Metre Iambic trimeter
×–|⏑⏑⏑ ––⏑– ––⏑– (word-end at position 2)

Discussion Meineke 3,315 & 5.1,85; Bothe 486; Kock 2,245; Edmonds 2,326f.; PCG 2,228; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 304

Citation Context The fragment is cited by Ulpian, within yet another display of his learnedness (cf. "Citation Context" for Amphis fr. 18). In Book 10.422e sqq. Ulpian prompts the banqueters to move on from eating to drinking; in so doing, he begins with a temporal clause signalling the end of dining (ἐπεὶ δεδείπναμεν; having concluded our dinner), but before proceeding to the main clause (423a εὐχόμενοι κεραννύωμεν; let us mix some wine in prayer), he makes a digression (422e - 423a) on expressions designating (in their majority) the conclusion of dining. Most of the fragments that he quotes feature the verb δειπνέω (dine) in present perfect tense (e. g. δεδείπναμεν and δεδειπνάναι). The last item on Ulpian's list is Amphis' present fragment that features the present perfect participle παραδεδειπνημένος (Ulpian's reason for citation is the participle's tense, and not any semantic relevance to his current address to the banqueters).

Constitution of Text The text is impeccable (from all aspects: metre, meaning, syntax) as preserved by the manuscript tradition, and there is no reason to alter it in any way. Still, Meineke (followed by Bothe) thought he should make παῖδες agree with the preceding participle in number (and subsequently replaced παραδεδειπνημένος with παραδεδειπνημένοι). This is, however, entirely unnecessary, for παῖδες makes perfect sense as a vocative.

Interpretation The context, the speaker's identity, the subject of the participle παραδεδειπνημένος are all highly elusive and beyond recovery. The speaker addresses a number of slaves (παῖδες) and describes either some other character or himself as being a parasite for a long time (on παραδειπνέω see s. v. below).

Metre The line does not allow for any caesura. There can only be a word-end (not a real caesura) at position 2, i. e. after the initial lacuna. Word-end at position 2 features regularly in the trimeter of the iambographers (mainly Archilochus, Semonides, and Solon); cf. Schein (1979) 5–11.

παραδεδειπνημένος LSJ[9] explain παραδειπνέομαι as go without one's dinner. Meineke (5.1,85) glosses Amphis' usage of the present perfect participle παραδεδειπνημένοι (sic) as "coena frustrati"; and Olson (in Ath. 10.423a) translates παραδεδειπνημένος as having been dinnerless.

Nevertheless, I believe that this interpretation of παραδειπνέω,-ομαι is erroneous and unsupported by any of the verb's occurrences. Instead, having studied the surviving evidence (which I analytically present below), I have come to the conclusion that the correct meaning of the verb παραδειπνέω is to dine next to someone and off him, i. e. to dine out of someone else's expenses, to be a freeloader, a parasite. First of all, the verb παραδειπνέω occurs three times in the surviving literary corpus: in Amphis' present fragment, in Thphr. Char. 8.12, and in Poll. 3.111 (left out by LSJ[9] s. v.). In Amphis the context is practically non-existent and no determinate meaning can be established (Meineke's glossing is unsubstantiated). In Theophrastus the text reads εἰσὶ δ' οἳ καὶ πόλεις τῷ λόγῳ κατὰ κράτος αἱροῦντες παρεδειπνήθησαν. Rusten ad loc. (LCL 225, [3]2002) translates: some of them (sc. the rumour-mongers) capture cities in an all-out talk-fight, but go without their dinner (as a gnomic aorist). Again, the context is inadequate and indeterminate as to the meaning of παρεδειπνήθησαν. Theophrastus enlists several independent instances of λογοποιία (rumour-mongering); this (§12) is just one such instance and the text ends here, rather abruptly and inconclusively. There is no obvious reason why παρεδειπνήθησαν should exclusively mean "go without their dinner", and not, say, "they dine on others' goods". The third occurrence is Poll. 3.111; here Pollux enumerates multiple expressions that denote various states of poverty; from being a pauper, e. g. ἀπορεῖν, πένεσθαι and πτωχεύειν to freeloading, e. g. παρασιτεῖν, παρατρέφεσθαι, παραδειπνεῖν. This passage allows us to define παραδειπνεῖν with enough confidence; the way Pollux enlists the three infinitives (παρασιτεῖν, παρατρέφεσθαι, παραδειπνεῖν) strongly suggests that he meant them to be synonymous.

Secondly, the etymology of παραδειπνέω strongly favours the meaning of freeloading. The verb derives from the preposition παρά (primarily meaning next to, beside, near) and the verb δειπνέω (dine); e. g. dining next to someone. This meaning for παραδειπνέω is paralleled and further supported by the verbs παρασιτέω and παρατρέφω: both these compound verbs consist of the preposition παρά with a verb meaning to eat (σιτέω and τρέφω respectively). Given that (a) παρασιτέω means eat at the table of another, and (b) παρατρέφω means feed beside, maintain in addition, I fail to see what would lead anyone to interpret παραδειπνέω any differently than dine next to someone as a parasite.

Thirdly, to further substantiate my argument, there is the noun παράδειπνις (proparoxytone according to LSJ[9] s. v. and Hunter 1983: 228–230). This is a hapax that occurs in Eub. fr. 137.3 ἀλλοτρίων κτεάνων παραδειπνίδες (diners on other people's goods); with παραδειπνίδες as paroxytone according to PCG 5,269 and Olson in Ath. 3.113f. Not only is the meaning of this noun (either proparoxytone or paroxytone) self-evident from the fragment's context as being synonymous to parasite, but in addition Eustathius (ad Il. 3.845.18) endorses this interpretation: παραδειπνίδες, ὃ παραπεποίηκεν ἐκεῖνος ἐκ τοῦ παράσιτοι ('paradeipnides', which the poet has produced as a variant of parasite). Given that παράδειπνις (i) obviously derives from the verb παραδειπνέω and (ii) demonstrably means parasite, it becomes manifestly clear that the meaning of παραδειπνέω is be a parasite, dine as a parasite; and this is how we should accordingly translate not only Amphis' present fragment but also Thphr. Char. 8.12 and Poll. 3.111. Last but not least, there is another derivative of παραδειπνέω featuring the notion of proximity to dinner, and this is the noun παραδείπνιον, which means side-dish, dainty (Porph. Abst. 3.18 = Plu. fr. 193.66).

To sum up, there is no evidence whatsoever to support either LSJ's interpretation of παραδειπνέομαι as go without one's dinner (the active παραδειπνέω is not recorded by LSJ[9], despite being attested in Poll. 3.111) or Meineke's glossing of παραδεδειπνημένοι as "coena frustrati". Instead, and at the risk of being redundant, the study of the usage of παραδειπνέω and its derivatives (παράδειπνις and παραδείπνιον), as well as the parallel cases of παρασιτέω and παρατρέφω, categorically validate the interpretation of παραδειπνέω as dine at someone else's table as a parasite.

Regarding the passive voice of the participle (παραδεδειπνημένος) in Amphis' fragment, given that παραδειπνέω means to dine as a parasite, the passive voice designates the person who has been fed as a parasite by a third party (e. g. a host, a symposiarch, etc.).

Σαπφώ (Sapphō)
("Sappho")

Discussion Edmonds 2,327; PCG 2,228 & 5,94; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 304

Title The figure of Sappho is remarkably popular in Greek Comedy; six comic plays (by Amipsias: PCG 2,204–205, cf. Orth 2013: 268–270; Antiphanes: PCG 2,424–426; Ephippus: PCG 5,148; Diphilus: PCG 5,94; Timocles: PCG 7,777; and the present one by Amphis) are named after the Lesbian poetess. What is additionally conspicuous is the duration of Sappho's popularity, which is defined at one end by Amipsias' play (Amipsias was Aristophanes' rough contemporary and remained active until, at least, 405 BC; cf. Orth 2013: 168–182 (esp. 173–175), PCG 2,197–198, Meineke 1,199), and at the other end by Timocles' and Diphilus' plays in late fourth century (Timocl. fr. 32 from his Sappho-play features Misgolas, a prominent late fourth century Athenian (PAA 654265), and Diphilus typically ranks as a New Comedy playwright next to Menander and Philemo; cf. PCG 5,47–51).

Although the theme of Amphis' present play cannot be recovered (the one surviving fragment consists of a single word), and no plot hints can be confidently established (apart from the fact that the play focused on Sappho, probably the historical figure rather than any other fictitious counterpart, e. g. a hetaira), still it is worth considering a number of plot possibilities. To do so, some preliminary remarks are necessary. The one distinct attribute that was closely associated with and stereotypically defined Sappho in antiquity was the love theme. Throughout Greek (and also Latin) literature, Sappho was normally considered the love poetess par excellence and was commonly regarded as an authority on love matters; see e. g. Pl. Phdr. 235c, Epicr. fr. 4, Clearch. fr. 33, Plu. 762f-763a, Paus. 9.27.3, [Demetr.] Eloc. 132, AP 7.407; Hor. Carm. 4.9.10–12, etc. Simultaneously, the poetess herself featured in various fictitious love-stories and anecdotes; Athenaeus, for one, informs us that (13.599d) Δίφιλος ὁ κωμῳδιοποιὸς πεποίηκεν ἐν Σαπφοῖ δράματι Σαπφοῦς ἐραστὰς Ἀρχίλοχον καὶ Ἱππώνακτα (Diphilus in his play "Sappho" represented Archilochus and Hipponax as Sappho's lovers) – in an apparently chronologically stretched scenario (Archilochus was, roughly, a generation older than Sappho, while Hipponax was a couple of generations younger); cf. Davies 1981. Likewise, Hermesianax described Alcaeus and Anacreon rivalling for her love (fr. 7.47–56 Powell); Chamaeleon (fr. 26) also refers to Sappho's alleged love affair with Anacreon. But the most celebrated lover that tradition assigned to Sappho was the mythical figure of Phaon (from Lesbos), an elderly and ugly, yet honourable, boatman, whom Aphrodite rejuvenated (as a reward for his honesty). According to the legend, Sappho being unable to conquer Phaon's heart or quench her passion for him (a passion so intense that Plautus uses it as an example in Mil. 1246–1247), committed suicide by throwing herself off a cliff at cape Leucatas (on the island of Leucas). Phaon's story is preserved in various versions and with multiple variations; see e. g. Palaeph. 48, Str. 10.2.9 (preserving a relevant reference by Menander), Luc. DMort. 19.2, Ael. VH 12.18–19, Ov. Her. 15 (cf. Knox 1995 ad loc.). Additionally, the comic playwright Plato wrote a play entitled Phaon (PCG 7,508–517); so did Antiphanes (PCG 2,437–438), though it is uncertain whether the title figure referred to Sappho's lover or to some Pythagorean ascetic (cf. Alex. fr. 223.15, and Arnott 1996: 639–640); cf. Cratin. fr. 370. Ribbeck (1854: 34–37) suggested that Menander's and Turpilius' Leucadia-plays narrated the love affair between Sappho and Phaon, though this interpretation is not adopted by later scholars (cf. comm. on Amphis' Leucas).

Given the typically erotic theme regularly associated with Sappho, it is reasonable to assume that Amphis' Sappho-play evolved around certain fictitious love adventures of the Lesbian poetess; either a single episode or a series of events. Sappho could have been either the enamoured protagonist or a go-between helping a friend – being an expert in love affairs herself. If Sappho was the love-struck figure, the identity of her would-be lover is beyond recovery; yet Diphilus' parallel case (featuring Archilochus vs. Hipponax as rival lovers) is an intriguing example that demonstrates how far comic imagination could reach. Yet, even if the theme of Amphis' play was erotic indeed, it is highly improbable that it was homosexually erotic. As Dover notes (1978: 172–173), there is a complete – and, hence, conspicuous – silence in Comedy on the subject of female homosexuality; cf. Wilamowitz (1913) 72, Most (1996) 14, 32–33 (NB that even male homosexuality is typically presented pejoratively in Comedy; cf. Henderson ^{2}1991: 208–209).

For further discussion of multiple aspects of Sappho's personality, poetic technique, reception, comic exploitation, etc., see – from among the vast and manifold bibliography – Wilamowitz (1913) 17–42; Dover (1978) 171–184, Nagy (1990) 223–262; Williamson (1995) 5–33; Greene (1996) passim; Lefkowitz & Fant (^{3}2005) 2–4; Kivilo (2010) 195–198; Lefkowitz (^{2}2012) 41–44; Davidson (2007) 391–417, esp. 402; D'Angour 2013.

fr. 32 (32 K.)

Antiatt. δ 29 (Val. p. 147)
δ ι ε ν ε χ θ ῆ ν α ι · ἀντὶ τοῦ μάχεσθαι. Ἄμφις Σαπφοῖ.

h a v i n g q u a r r e l l e d w i t h: instead of fighting. Amphis in "Sappho".

Metre Unknown
⏑⏑——×

Discussion Meineke 3,315; Bothe 486; Kock 2,246; Edmonds 2,326f.; PCG 2,228; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 304

Citation Context The context is literally non-existent. The fragment forms part of a long and heterogeneous list of one- or two–word quotations by Antiatticist under the letter delta, which includes nouns, adjectives, stereotypical expressions, infinitives, and verbs (in various tenses, numbers, and persons). On Antiatticist see Amphis fr. 12.

Interpretation The verb διαφέρω in the middle and passive voice typically means be at variance, quarrel (cf. LSJ[9] s. v.); hence, it is rather odd that the Antiatticist felt that he needed to prove this meaning as if it were a rare or an irregular one. This meaning for διαφέρομαι is reported as early as Heraclitus (fr. 10, ap. Pl. Sph. 242d) and is fairly common throughout Greek literature; cf. e. g. Hdt. 1.173, Th. 5.31.1, X. An. 4.5.17, D. 56.46, Plu. 2.80d, etc.

διενεχθῆναι According to the TLG, the passive second aorist infinitive of διαφέρομαι occurs a total of forty times in the surviving corpus of Greek literature; interestingly, most of these occurrences post-date Amphis. And surprisingly enough, the earliest instance of διενεχθῆναι is found in a badly mutilated papyric fragment of Sappho: διεν]εχθῆναι (fr. S261[a]2 col.1,18 Page Suppl.). After Sappho, the next recorded instances of διενεχθῆναι occur in the fourth century, in four texts roughly contemporary to Amphis' fragment; these are Pl. La. 180e, D. 25.83, Aeschin. 3.81, and Eudox. fr. 214d. It is intriguing that in a comic play called Sappho Amphis employed a specific infinitive, first attested in Sappho's corpus and only sporadically used since. Could it be that the comic playwright presented the Lesbian poetess on stage reciting some of her own verses? In the absence of any firm evidence, all conjectures are unprovable and no more than wishful thinking.

Φιλάδελφοι (Philadelphoi)
("The Loving Siblings")

Discussion Bothe 486; Edmonds 2,327; PCG 2,228 & 5,102; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 304f.; Papachrysostomou 96

Title Amphis' present play belongs in a series of comic plays entitled Φιλάδελφοι. This is the only Middle Comedy example of such a play and, hence, probably the earliest (though no precise date can be established). There are five more Φιλάδελφοι-plays produced by playwrights of New Comedy: Menander (PCG 6.2,241ff.), Apollodorus Gelous (PCG 2,504f.), Diphilus (PCG 5,102 Φιλάδελφοι or -ος), Phillipides (PCG 7,344), and Sosicrates (PCG 7,600f.). No plot can be established for any of these plays, apart from Menander's, which Plautus adapted in his Stichus; in the latter play two brothers marry two sisters; see Webster (1974) 112–114 and (^{2}1960) 112, 139–145. In the absence of all evidence, it is impossible to establish whether Menander's scenario had any antecedents (e. g. Amphis' play) or not.

The adjective φιλάδελφος is compound, deriving from the verb φιλέω (to love) and the noun ἀδελφός (brother or sister; sibling), and designates the person who loves / shows loving affection towards their sibling (cf. LSJ^{9} s. v.); e. g. S. Ant. 527, X. Mem. 2.3.17, Plu. Sol. 27.5 (of Cleobis and Bito). The adjective Φιλάδελφος was also used as a title of kings; most famously of Ptolemy II, king of Egypt (282 – 246 BC), on the grounds of his incestuous relationship with his sister, and subsequently his wife, Queen Arsinoë (see Mitteis & Wilcken 1912: 106; McKechnie & Guillaume 2008; Posidipp. epigr. 119 A-B ap. Ath. 7.318d).

However, determining the current play-title's precise meaning is not an easy task, since φιλάδελφος is an adjective of two endings (ὁ / ἡ φιλάδελφος, τὸ φιλάδελφον); thus, the plural nominative φιλάδελφοι may be of either male or female gender. Therefore, all we can say with certainty is that the title-figures of Amphis' play were an unknown number of siblings (two or more) of unknown sex (it could be all males, all females or a combination of both sexes). Bothe (486) assumes Φιλάδελφοι as being exclusively of male gender and, accordingly, translates the play-title as "Fratres amantes".

It is likely that the plot evolved around the adventures of these loving siblings (narrating either an isolated episode or a series of events). The aforementioned examples of Menander's and Plautus' plays give us an idea of what these adventures / events may have been. Alternatively, Antiphanes fr. 19 in his play Aeolus (PCG 2,319f.) serves as a different kind of parallel, that of mythological burlesque (a most typical technique in Middle Comedy, and commonly used by Amphis; cf. Intro. 4 "Themes & Motifs"). Antiphanes' play was probably a parody of Euripides' Aeolus (frr. 13a-41, plus testimonia; TrGF 5.1,158–173). Antiph. fr. 19 mentions Macareus (a son of Aeolus), who fell in love with his sister Canace and subsequently (under the influence of wine) either raped her or engaged into an incestuous relationship with her (the tradition is not unanimous); as a result, Canace committed suicide. See Hom. Od. 10.6–7; Plu. 312c-d; Hygin. Fab. 242; Ov. Her. 11; cf. Ar. Nu. 1371–1372 and Ra. 1081. Although the speaker in Antiph. fr. 19 assumes a negative perspective towards wine and the speaker in Amphis' present fragment a positive one, both fragments ultimately argue the same, i. e. the overwhelming effects of wine (cf. "Interpretation" below). This notional convergence may be either a coincidence, since wine-drinking is a comic topos (cf. comm. on Amphis fr. 9.3b) or an indication of a thematic convergence between the two homonymous plays. Certainty is impossible.

fr. 33 (33 K.)

κατὰ πόλλ' ἐπαινῶ μᾶλλον ἡμῶν τὸν βίον τὸν τῶν φιλοποτῶν ἤπερ ὑμῶν τῶν μόνον ἐν τῷ μετώπῳ νοῦν ἔχειν εἰωθότων.
ἡ μὲν γὰρ ἐπὶ τοῦ συντετάχθαι διὰ τέλους 5 φρόνησις οὖσα διὰ τὸ λεπτῶς καὶ πυκνῶς πάντ' ἐξετάζειν δέδιεν ἐπὶ τὰ πράγματα ὁρμᾶν προχείρως, ἡ δὲ διὰ τὸ μὴ σαφῶς τί ποτ' ἀφ' ἑκάστου πράγματος συμβήσεται διαλελογίσθαι δρᾷ τι καὶ νεανικὸν 10 καὶ θερμόν

1 κατὰ πολλὰ A: om. CE, Eust.: κατὰ πόλλ' K-A μᾶλλον om. Eust. 2 τὸν om. Eust. φιλοποτῶν CE, Eust.: -πωτῶν A (corr. -ποτῶν man. rec.) 3 ἐν ACE, Eust.: ἐπὶ Meineke Anal. p. 203 4–10 om. CE, Eust. 9 διαλελογίσθαι Mus.: διαλελόγισται A

On many accounts I praise the life of the drink-lovers more than the life of you, who are used to having only wit in your head.
This kind of sense, being always engaged in getting 5 matters organised, because it scrutinises all things deeply and carefully, fears to rush hurriedly upon business, whereas the other kind of sense, as a result of not having calculated exactly what may ever come out of every single action, accomplishes something that is both daring 10 and fiery

Ath. 10.447f–448b (inde Eust. ad Il. 3,730.2–5)
Ἄμφις δ' ἐν Φιλαδέλφοις (fab. nom. om. CE, Eust.) ἐπαινῶν τὸν τῶν φιλοποτῶν φησι βίον· κατὰ —— θερμόν Amphis in "The Loving Siblings" praising the drink-lovers' modus vivendi says: On —— fiery"

Metre Iambic trimeter

1. ⏑⏑–⏑– –|–⏑– ––⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
2. ––⏑⏑⏑ –|–⏑– ––⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
3. ––⏑– –|–⏑– ––⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
4. ––⏑⏑⏑ –|–⏑– –⏑⏑⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
5. ⏑–⏑– ⏑|⏑⏑⏑– ––⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
6. ––⏑– –|⏑⏑⏑⏑⏑ ––⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
7. ––⏑– –|–⏑⏑⏑ ⏑–⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
8. ⏑⏑⏑⏑– –|–⏑– ––⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
9. ⏑⏑⏑⏑– –|–⏑– ⏑–⏑ – (penthemimeral caesura)
10. ––⏑

Discussion Meineke 3,316; Bothe 486; Kock 2,246; Edmonds 2,326–329; PCG 2,229; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 304f.; Papachrysostomou 96–99

Citation Context This fragment belongs to a lengthy series of quotations (drawn from various literary genres) in Book 10 of Deipnosophistae, all of which pertain to the vast, multi-faceted, and seemingly inexhaustible issue of wine. Ulpian's prompt to the banqueters to mix some wine (κεραννύωμεν) in 10.423a, after the conclusion of the dining part of the symposion (ἐπεὶ δεδείπναμεν; 422e), sets off the ensuing discussion on wine and wine-drinking. Cf. "Citation Context" for Amphis fr. 31.

As to Eustathius (ad Il. 3,730.2–5), the point of his partial (or, say, minimal) quotation of the fragment is completely irrelevant to wine; instead, his aim (peripheral to the subject he discusses) is rather to demonstrate that Comedy – mockingly – locates the νοῦς (mind, wit) of those who practise philosophy on the forehead (μέτωπον), on account of the grave countenance the latter commonly assume (σεμνοπροσωπεῖν).

Constitution of Text Much of the text is preserved only in Athenaeus' codex A (Marcianus; cf. Intro. 3 "Tradition & Reception"). Codices C and E along with our other source, Eustathius (copying from Athenaeus and not directly from Amphis), leave out lines 4 to 10 entirely. Lines 1 and 2 are preserved in their entirety only in codex A, again. In l. 2 the reading φιλοποτῶν was initially written incorrectly (φιλοπωτῶν) in codex A, but a later hand emended it to φιλοποτῶν (codices C, E, and Eustathius preserve the correct reading). In l. 3 the tradition unanimously preserves the reading ἐν; yet, Meineke (Anal. 203) suggested the reading ἐπί, without providing any explanation. The reason is probably the seemingly irregular usage of the preposition ἐν with the dative to designate position, and specifically the notion of upon, which is normally stated via the preposition ἐπί with the dative (cf. LSJ[9] s. v.). However, the locative notion of upon in the present fragment is metaphorical, since τῷ μετώπῳ stands by synecdoche for the entire head (κεφαλή), into (ἐν) which the brain (νοῦν) is said to be located (cf. comm. s. v. μετώπῳ below). Besides, it would be absurd to describe the mind as being situated upon the forehead (or even into it). Therefore, the preposition ἐν here ultimately means in, and μέτωπον should be interpreted as head. Besides, there is a parallel in [Demosthenes] for this uncommon usage of ἐν with the dative, featuring synecdoche again: (7.45) εἴπερ ὑμεῖς τὸν ἐγκέφαλον ἐν τοῖς κροτάφοις καὶ μὴ ἐν ταῖς πτέρναις καταπεπατημένον φορεῖτε (if you carry your brains in your heads and not trodden down in your heels); cf. Eup. fr. 104.3. But, above all, there is no need to alter Amphis' text, as unanimously preserved by the manuscript tradition (ἐν τῷ μετώπῳ), since it satisfies the metre and the meaning (via synecdoche), and is grammatically and syntactically correct. In l. 9 codex A preserves the reading διαλελόγισται, which Musurus rightly corrected to διαλελογίσθαι; the latter is precisely what the syntax presently requires, i. e. an articular infinitive (τὸ διαλελογίσθαι). This is a negative articular infinitive, preceded by the preposition διὰ (and, therefore, denoting cause), split (tmēsis) between lines 7 and 9 διὰ τὸ μὴ … διαλελογίσθαι.

Interpretation This fragment constitutes praise of the lifestyle of wine-drinkers and, indirectly, a eulogy of wine (cf. comm. on Amphis fr. 9.3b, and "Interpretation" for Amphis fr. 41). The speaker detects and juxtaposes two distinct groups of people, the drink-lovers (φιλοπόται) and the sensible, sedate ones (described in l. 3 as the ones who are used to having wits in their head); accordingly, he draws a contrast between promptness and hesitation to act.[23]

[23] This contrast is heavily reminiscent of the comparison that Thucydides 1.69–70 makes between the Athenians and the Spartans; cf. Gomme's comm. ad loc.

He straightforwardly identifies himself as a member of the former group (note the personal pronoun, ἡμῶν τῶν φιλοποτῶν) and proceeds to declare (and justify) his preference and support for this group. As he explains, the drink-lovers refrain from painstaking (and tiresome) rumination; instead, they are spontaneous (ὁρμᾶν προχείρως) and enjoy a lively lifestyle, out of which exciting deeds can happen. His point is that without a rigorous calculation of the risks involved in a particular course of action, one can achieve outstanding things. The incentive is of course the wine; under its effect people tend to act more spontaneously, without considering in advance the possibility of negative results. On the contrary, the sensible persons are said to over-analyse and carefully scrutinise (πυκνῶς; l. 5) their future actions, paying excessive attention to detail (λεπτῶς) and making sure they have thought through the entire course of action that lies ahead of them (ἐπὶ τοῦ συντετάχθαι διὰ τέλους). Hence, they end up being hesitant, indecisive and always engaged in meticulous examination of minutiae, while their mind is endlessly absorbed in getting things in order. As a result of this exaggerated deliberation and pre-planning, they refrain from acting spontaneously (δέδιεν … ὁρμᾶν προχείρως). Therefore, their life lacks excitement and interest. In order to describe the two groups of people, the comic character describes the different ways their minds work, and in so doing he engages in an intriguing personification of the mind (ἡ μὲν … φρόνησις … ἡ δὲ …), which is paralleled by Amphis fr. 3 (cf. comm. ad loc.); see further below on l. 4a.

It appears that there is some sort of reciprocity between wine-drinking and a spontaneous temperament; wine induces spontaneity, while it is the inherently spontaneous ones who are more inclined to indulge in wine-drinking.

The two groups contrasted by the speaker (the drink-lovers and the sensible ones) are represented in the text by the personal pronouns ἡμῶν (l. 1) and ὑμῶν (l. 2); but it is impossible to establish the identity of the members of each group. We could have two opposing semichoruses (cf. e. g. Ar. Ach. 557–571), with the speaker being the leader of one of them. Another possibility is that the speaker represents the play's characters as opposed to the spectators (ὑμῶν), whom he addresses directly and abuses (on audience abuse in Comedy cf. comm. on Amphis fr. 17.4b). Alternatively, the fragment could simply be a random snapshot of any given confrontation between different types of characters within the play. Whatever the case, we may reasonably assume that the drink-lovers (whoever these may have been) were portrayed as not simply indulging in wine but also as pursuing a hedonistic lifestyle in general, similar to the one propagated elsewhere in Comedy; e. g. Amphis frr. 8 and 21 (see "Interpretation" and comm. ad loc.).

Overall, the fragment gives the impression that spontaneity and hastiness lie at the heart of events related to the play, and that somebody either did or will do something while drunk. This unknown, spontaneous, and unthought-of act / event either preceded the play (in which case the speaker would be informing the audience about the prehistory of events that they are about to see on stage, perhaps in a prologue speech; cf. the case of Menander's Epitrepontes, where a divinity probably delivered a delayed prologue speech providing the audience with background information – see Gomme & Sandbach 1973: 293–294, Furley 2009: 8–10) or else was meant to be unfolded during the course of the play. I have argued elsewhere (Papachrysostomou 2008: 96, and 2012–2013a: 185–186) that Amphis' present fragment possibly foreshadows New Comedy's much-loved repertoire of maidens' rapes carried out by drunk youths; cf. Men. Sam. 35–36 (Plangon is raped during the Adonia), Epit. 450–479 (Pamphile is raped during the Tauropolia); see further Sommerstein 1998 and Robson 2015. This is indeed a reasonable hypothesis, though just one of many viable interpretations of this fragment's high-spirited soliloquy.

Metre The number of resolutions (of ancipitia and longa) is conspicuously high in this fragment; in total, there are ten resolutions. Lines 4 and 6 feature two resolutions each. This remarkable accumulation of resolutions results in an overall agile and vivid rhythm, which is closely associated with the speaker's overwhelming exuberance (cf. "Metre" Amphis fr. 30).

2 φιλοποτῶν The noun φιλοπότης describes the person who loves drinking (wine). The speaker uses this term as a generic tag to collectively identify the group in whose favour he fervently argues, and in which he belongs himself (the other group being the sensible ones; cf. "Interpretation"). The straightforwardly positive portrayal and praise of wine-lovers in this fragment is in perfect line with comic tradition's catholic standpoint on this issue; cf. e. g. Ar. V. 79–80 (being a φιλοπότης is considered a χρηστῶν ἀνδρῶν νόσος, i. e. a disease of good chaps[24]), Eup. fr. 221.1 (the fifth-century politician Cimon is described as being merely φιλοπότης but not κακός; Cimon's fondness of wine is assessed rather unfavorably elsewhere, e. g. Plu. Cim. 4.4, Antipho 87 B 76 DK; cf. Goossens 1942), Alex. fr. 285.1 (οὐδεὶς φιλοπότης ἐστὶν ἄνθρωπος κακός; a drink-lover can never be a bad person), Diph. fr. 86 (Dionysus is described as προσφιλέστατος τοῖς φρονοῦσι; dearest to the sensible ones; cf. Dodds [2]1960: 121), Bato fr. 2.9, etc. For further analysis of wine see comm. on Amphis fr. 9.3b. Of course, one needs to acknowledge that all these fragments communicate an implicit air of subtle irony, as they argue in favour of wine-drinking. Outside Comedy, being a φιλοπότης is openly considered a bad habit, and even a vice – especially when practised to excess; see e. g. Hdt. 2.174.1, Hp. Aër. 1, Plu. Phoc. 20, etc. Philip II of Macedon had a reputation of being a φιλοπότης; cf. Theopomp. FGrH 115 F 163 and 282.

[24] Arnott (1996) 780 considers this Aristophanic line to be a negative comment, though MacDowell (1971) 140 notes that "fondness of drink is … jokingly adduced as a sign of merit".

3 ἐν τῷ μετώπῳ Here the term μέτωπον (forehead) stands by synecdoche for the entire head (κεφαλή); hence, the seemingly irregular usage of ἐν with the dative. See "Constitution of Text".

2–3 μόνον / ἐν τῷ μετώπῳ νοῦν ἔχειν εἰωθότων Those who are used to having only wit in their head form the second group of persons, which the speaker disparages. These are the sensible, prudent, and sedate ones, who are being contrasted with the group of wine-lovers.

The nature and location of intellect constituted a controversial issue throughout antiquity. The philosopher and medical writer Alcmaeon of Croton, in the first half of the fifth century BC, was the first who acknowledged the brain (νοῦς) as the seat of intellect (with both Philolaus and Plato adopting his view); cf. comm. on Amphis fr. 3.3. Likewise, the speaker in Amphis' present fragment identifies νοῦς as the seat of intellect, and pictures it as being located in the head; this view is also argued in various texts throughout Greek literature (e. g. Hp. Gland. 10, Morb. Sacr. 17; Pl. Ti. 73c-d). However, elsewhere it is the heart instead that is believed to be the centre of intelligence; cf. Emp. 31 B 105 DK, Arist. MA 703^{a}14, etc. Yet, according to a different perspective advanced by Aristotle, the intellect should not be associated with any bodily organ; cf. Arist. de An. 307^{b}4–5 εἴπερ βέλτιον τῷ νῷ μὴ μετὰ σώματος εἶναι (if it is true that it is better for the mind to be without the body). On the vast subject of intellect and its multiple ramifications see Longrigg (1993) 47–81 and (1998) 31–39, 62–63, 73, 76–77; Cohoe 2012 and 2013; Huffman 2013 (with further, exhaustive bibliography).

Regarding the verb ἔθω (to be accustomed), its most frequently occurring tenses are the perfect εἴωθα and the pluperfect εἰώθειν, which are commonly used with present and imperfect sense respectively; cf. LSJ^{9} s. v.

4a ἐπὶ τοῦ συντετάχθαι The verb συντάσσω in passive voice means to be organised, orderly, resolute. It can apply to individual persons (e. g. συντεταγμένος στρατηγός: an unyielding general; X. HG 4.8.22), armies (e. g. συντεταγμένοι ἐπορεύοντο: they marched in orderly lines; X. HG 4.2.21), and also – though rarely – to mental / intellectual processes; e. g. Th. 5.9.6 πρὶν ξυνταχθῆναι τὴν δόξαν (before gathering their thoughts together / before thinking it over / before regaining their composure). Thucydides' manuscript tradition preserves the reading ξυνταχθῆναι, which Krüger emends to ξυνταθῆναι – albeit to produce a similar meaning. Rather than assuming Thucydides' ξυνταχθῆναι to be a manuscripts' mistake, I would rather see it as an interesting parallel to Amphis' present fragment, where the mind (φρόνησις / νοῦς) is personified and is pictured as a resolute and staunch agent, determined to scrutinise every future path of action before taking any decisions. The mind is visualised being concentrated on the task of organising everything (i. e. the quintessential meaning of συντάσσομαι) and being entirely absorbed in this procedure (διὰ τέλους). The concept of mind as a concrete (and even occasionally mobile) entity is a common pattern in Comedy, and often entails its personification; see comm. on Amphis fr. 3.3. An interesting parallel occurs in Aeschin. 1.179 ἐπειδὰν … τὰς ψυχὰς ἐφ' ἑτέρων γένησθε (when … your minds have become intent on other things), where the term ψυχή is meant to designate the conscious, intellectual self (cf. LSJ[9] s. v. ψυχή IV.4).

4b διὰ τέλους A stereotypical expression meaning through to the end, completely, through the whole time; see e. g. Alex. fr. 131.6, Men. fr. 236.16, Hegesipp. fr. 2.3, Philem. fr. 92.4. Cf. LSJ[9] s. v. τέλος II.2c.

5a φρόνησις Here the term φρόνησις is being used as synonymous to νοῦς. It is personified (cf. comm. on l. 4a) and is assigned an all-encompassing meaning of wit, thought, practical sense.

5b λεπτῶς καὶ πυκνῶς These two adverbs describe the way in which, according to the comic character, the mind of sedate persons works; i. e. through subtle analysis of details (λεπτῶς) and with deep / careful thought (πυκνῶς). In Homer the adjective λεπτός means weak, slender, and is typically used to define the noun μῆτις (plan, device); e. g. Il. 10.226, 23.590. The first occurrence of λεπτός with reference to intellectual refinement and linguistic subtlety occurs in E. Med. 529 (νοῦς λεπτός; clever / percipient mind); cf. E. Hipp. 923 (λεπτουργεῖς; you speak subtly). It is with this meaning that Aristophanes uses this adjective and its cognates thereafter, usually (though not exclusively) as a parody either of Socrates' / sophists' / philosophers'[25] syllogisms in Clouds (e. g. 153 τῆς λεπτότητος τῶν φρενῶν: what subtlety of mind; also 230, 320, 359 with anc. sch. ad loc.) or of Euripides' verbal intricacy, e. g. Ar. Ach. 445 (spoken by Euripides) πυκνῇ γὰρ λεπτὰ μηχανᾷ φρενί (for you contrive finely with your dense mind). See also Ar. Av. 318 (though in l. 235 λεπτός is used with reference to sound).

The usage of the adjective πυκνός to denote deep / thorough / absorbing thought traces back to the Homeric phrase πύκα φρονεόντων (e. g. Il. 9.554), meant to describe the wise people (πύκα being the poetic form of πυκνῶς). Cf. Ar. Nu. 700–702 φρόντιζε δὴ καὶ διάθρει … πυκνώσας (think and contem- plate … whilst concentrating/ gathering your thoughts), Th. 438 πᾶν δ' ἐβάστασε φρενὶ πυκνῶς (she sagaciously weighed every detail in her mind); cf. ancient scholia ad loc. Neil (1901: 152) detects an air of irony in the usage of the noun πυκνότης at Ar. Eq. 1132–1134 (καί σοι πυκνότης ἔνεστ' / ἐν τῷ τρόπῳ … πάνυ πολλή; your character contains very deep cunning); among the parallels he cites for such an ironic use of this adjective is Amphis' present fragment.

[25] On Socrates' portrayal in Clouds see Dover (1968) xxxii-lvii.

7 προχείρως Readily, without much consideration, hurriedly, spontaneously, rashly; cf. Alex. fr. 257.5. In an intriguing coincidence, which amazingly corroborates the comic character's current argument, the historian Theopompus describes Philip II of Macedon as being φιλοπότης (FGrH 115 163 and 282; cf. s. v. φιλοποτῶν), and elsewhere (FGrH 115 F 224) mentions that the Macedonian king carried out his actions προχείρως: προχείρως ἅπαντα ποιῶν (doing everything rashly).

9 διαλελογίσθαι The present meaning of the verb διαλογίζομαι is to calculate, to assess, to weigh one's options; cf. Diph. fr. 42.15. The use of perfect tense in Amphis' fragment is important, since it links the past (calculating) to the present (acting) and further emphasises the very notion expressed by the verb. Hence, the meaning of this causal negative articular infinitive as a whole (διὰ τὸ μὴ σαφῶς … διαλελογίσθαι) is that, because the drink-lovers refrain from calculating exactly every possible outcome, they engage hurriedly into action. On the contrary, the sedate ones spend too much time carefully calculating their options, before any action of theirs can come to fruition.

9–10 νεανικὸν / καὶ θερμόν Both adjectives – used as positive characterisations – refer to and describe as exciting (and much more) the actions/ deeds (δρᾷ τι), which spontaneously emanate from wine-drinking and the subsequent impulsiveness of drink-lovers (cf. "Interpretation"). However, these adjectives do not always bear a positive meaning.

In its positive sense the adjective νεανικός designates – primarily – someone or something that is youthful (e. g. Ar. V. 1066–1067 ῥώμην / νεανικήν; youthful strength) and, hence, robust, vigorous, active; consequently, impetuous and high-spirited (e. g. Ar. V. 1205, Pl. Ly. 204e γενναῖον καὶ νεανικὸν τὸν ἔρωτα; a noble and dashing love). Also, as a colloquialism, νεανικός can also mean hefty, large, e. g. Ar. Pl. 1137, Antiph. fr. 188.20, Alex. fr. 193.2; cf. Stevens (1976) 49–50. However, the notions of youth, young age, as well as anything novel in general were commonly treated with great caution, suspicion, and mistrust; accordingly, νεανικός as a negative characterisation (of anything animate or inanimate) can mean insolent, headstrong, vehement. See e. g. Ar. Ach. 525, 601 (on Lamachus' young age), 680, 685; E. Hipp. 1204 φόβος νεανικός (violent fear; cf. Barrett 1978 ad loc.), Th. 1.102.3 δείσαντες τῶν Ἀθηναίων τὸ τολμηρὸν καὶ τὴν νεωτεροποιίαν (about Spartans' wariness of Athenians' novel political regime, after Ephialtes' reform in 462/1 BC), etc. According to Stevens (1976: 49–50), the adjective νεανικός "is not used at all, literally or metaphorically, in serious poetry, apart from Euripides, and in the fifth century is apparently confined to Euripides and Comedy". See further Björck 1952 and Dover (1974) 102–106. Translating in one word the term νεανικόν as used in the present fragment is not an easy task, for it presently encompasses and conveys a complex meaning; it denotes something that is high-spirited and impetuous, and at the same time vigorous and vehement, being a result of some spontaneous (re)action.

The adjective θερμός – in its metaphorical sense (which is the one that concerns us here) – means hasty, hot-headed. It can refer to both persons and actions, and, depending on the context, this characterisation can be meant either positively or negatively; cf. e.g. Ar. V. 918, Th. 735 (ὦ θερμόταται γυναῖκες; you, impassioned women), Pl. 415 (θερμὸν ἔργον κἀνόσιον καὶ παράνομον; a brazen, unholy, and lawless deed); A. Th. 603 (ναύταισι θερμοῖς; with headstrong sailors), Eu. 560; S. Tr. 1046–1047 πολλὰ δὴ καὶ θερμά / … μοχθήσας (having suffered many and savage labours), etc.

fr. 34 (34 K.)

Ἄπολλον, ὡς δυσάρεστόν ἐστ' ἀνιώμενος ἄνθρωπος ἐφ' ἅπασίν τε δυσχερῶς ἔχει

1 Ἄπολλον, ὡς om. Mac. 2 ἔχει SMA, Mac.: ἔχων Meineke V 1 p. 85

O Apollo, how cantankerous is a distressed man, and how gets irritated with everything (or everyone)

Stob. 4.35.16 (περὶ λύπης / on sorrow) vol. V p. 860 H. (codd. SMA, Mac.)
Ἀμφιδος Φιλαδέλφων (Φιλ. om. S Mac.)· Ἄπ. — ἔχει

From Amphis, from "The Loving Siblings": "O Apollo — (or everyone)"

Metre Iambic trimeter
1. ⏑–⏑|– ⏑⏑–⏑– ⏑⏑–⏑– (triemimeral caesura)
2. ––⏑|⏑⏑ ––⏑– ⏑–⏑– (triemimeral caesura)

Discussion Meineke 3,316 & 5.1,85; Bothe 486; Kock 2,246; Edmonds 2,328f.; PCG 2,229; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 305; Papachrysostomou 99–100

Citation Context This fragment is preserved by Stobaeus, who in Book 4, section 35 of his Anthology compiles thirty-five fragments that refer to sorrow, grief (περὶ λύπης). His list includes quotations from both comedy and tragedy, and concludes with a saying attributed to Socrates stressing that grief/pain is part and parcel of human life (4.35.35): Σωκράτης ἐρωτηθείς, πῶς ἄν τις ἄλυπος διάγοι "τοῦτο ἀδύνατον" εἶπεν "οὐ γὰρ ἔστι πόλιν ἢ οἰκίαν οἰκοῦντα καὶ ἀνθρώποις ὁμιλοῦντα μὴ λυπεῖσθαι" (when Socrates was asked how one could live his life without ever experiencing grief, "this is impossible", he said, "for no one can live in a town or a house or be in the company of men and never feel pain).

Constitution of Text The beginning of l. 1 (Ἄπολλον, ὡς) is preserved by three codices (S, M, and A) but is omitted by Macarius Chrysocephalus (on Stobaeus' manuscript tradition and on the indebtedness of Macarius' anthology to Stobaeus' see Intro. 3 "Tradition & Reception"). It is likely that Macarius, holding a religious office in the Christian Orthodox Church (he was Metropolite of Philadelphia), intentionally left out the initial invocation to Apollo (considering it a pagan element). In l. 2 the manuscript tradition unanimously preserves the reading ἔχει, which Meineke 5.1,85 (followed by Kock 2,246) would like to see emended to ἔχων, since he obviously failed to understand the text's syntactic structure, thinking that τε connects the participle ἀνιώμενος with the verb ἔχει; hence, he produces another participle (ἔχων) to correspond to ἀνιώμενος. Indeed, the copulative enclitic conjunction τε typically needs to connect two syntactically similar/equal units, and so it does in this fragment; it connects two verbs, ἐστ' and ἔχει; the subject of both verbs is ἄνθρωπος. The neuter gender of the adjective δυσάρεστον should not hold us long, for the use of neuter complement with masculine or feminine subject is common, and is meant as an attribute to the gender-less notion (thing) represented by the masculine or feminine subject; e. g. Amphis fr. 1.1–2 (γυναικός ἐστιν εὐνοϊκώτερον / ἑταίρα; a hetaira is "something" more favourable than a wife; cf. comm. ad loc.), E. Or. 232 (δυσάρεστον οἱ νοσοῦντες: the sick/ the sickness as a state of being is "something" that is hard to please; = Men. Asp. 432); see Kühner & Gerth (41955) i.1 §96. Hence, the meaning and structure of Amphis' present fragment are to be comprehended as follows: a man (ἄνθρωπος) when distressed (ἀνιώμενος) is (ἐστ') a thing hard to please (δυσάρεστον) and (τε) gets irritated (ἔχει δυσχερῶς), etc.

Interpretation A comic character comments on the peevish behaviour of a grieved man and attributes the latter's irascibility and fretfulness to his grief. This grief has obviously been caused by some event(s) relating to the plot; this/these event(s) could either occur during the play or belong to the play's prehistory (in which case its consequences would unfold during the play). But the precise reason for this grief remains unknown. There is no doubt that what the speaker says relates straightforwardly to the plot and derives from a precise dramatic situation within the play; yet, it is worth noting how the speaker proceeds to generalise his argument so that it becomes a truism, applicable to human life and human relationships. The generalisation of arguments relating to the play's plot is a distinct pattern, which permeates all eras of Greek Comedy and can even border with the exercise of (fake) philosophy; cf. Amphis fr. 3 ("Interpretation") and Papachrysostomou (2012–2013a) 167–173.

The speaker may be a slave, friend, well-wisher, adviser, or even one of the siblings featuring in the play's title (commenting on his/her sibling's attitude). Certainty is impossible. Whatever his identity, the speaker probably enters the stage with the purpose of reporting on the event(s) that caused distress to the other character. The latter's irascibility is such that he is ready to become angry at everything or everyone (ἐφ' ἅπασιν). There is a scene in Menander that could perhaps serve as an interesting parallel; this is Epit. 878–907, where the slave Onesimos comes out of the house and, addressing the spectators, comments on the state of his master Charisius who is going mad (878–881): ὑπομαίνεθ' οὗτος, νὴ τὸν Ἀπόλλω, μαίνεται· / μεμάνητ' ἀληθῶς· μαίνεται νὴ τοὺς θεούς· / τὸν δεσπότην λέγω Χαρίσιον. χολὴ / μέλαινα προσπέπτωκεν ἢ τοιοῦτό τι (The man's quite mad – yes, by Apollo, mad! He's really crazy; yes, he's mad, by heaven! I mean Charisios, my master. He's got melancholia or some such ailment). See Amphis fr. 37 "Interpretation".

1a δυσάρεστον The speaker uses the adjective δυσάρεστος to describe the grieved man as being ill to please, temperamental, irritable; on the neuter gender cf. "Constitution of Text". The adjective δυσάρεστος is regularly employed to describe similarly bad-tempered persons (e. g. Ar. Ec. 180 χαλεπὸν μὲν οὖν ἄνδρας δυσαρέστους νουθετεῖν: it is hard to talk sense to cantankerous men; Diph. fr. 63, Isoc. 1.31, etc.), implacable divinities (A. Eum. 928–929 δυσαρέστους / δαίμονας) or even a peevish city (E. El. 904 δυσάρεστος ἡμῶν καὶ φιλόψογος πόλις: our city is peevish and inclined to criticise); cf. Or. 232 (= Men. Asp. 432).

1b ἀνιώμενος The verb ἀνιάω,-ῶ means to grieve, and the passive ἀνιάομαι,-ῶμαι to be grieved, distressed, vexed. The verb is already attested in Homer (with a longum iota), e. g. Il. 2.291 (ἀνιηθέντα; disheartened), Od. 1.133, etc. Comic parallels (with a brevis iota, as here) include Ar. fr. 504.11, Pax 764, Lys. 593; Antiph. fr. 235.4, etc.

1–2 δυσάρεστον … δυσχερῶς The prefix δυσ- features twice within these two lines. This is not a felicitous coincidence, but it should rather be interpreted as an intentional rhetorical repetition, meant to mark on the level of linguistic register how δύσ-κολος in his manners this man is. The adjective δυσχερής, when applied to persons, means ill-tempered / unfriendly; for the adverbial expression δυσχερῶς ἔχειν cf. Pl. Prt. 332a δυσχερῶς δοκεῖς μοι ἔχειν πρὸς τοῦτο (you seem frustrated with this suggestion). Yet, the syntactical structure presently employed by Amphis (δυσχερῶς ἔχειν ἐπί τινι) is unparalleled.

2 ἐφ' ἅπασιν The present usage of the preposition ἐπί with the dative communicates the notion of reference / towards. The indefinite pronominal adjective ἅπας constitutes a strengthened form of πᾶς and is typically used for emphasis, for the sake of euphony after consonants or for metrical reasons; cf. Smyth (1956) §337, LSJ[9] s. vv.

As to the gender of ἅπασιν in this fragment, it could be either masculine or neuter. Whatever the case, the importance lies not with the meaning (which, anyway, does not significantly change), but with the hostile sense that is implied by the preposition ἐπί with the dative. The grieved man is ready to get mad at practically anything; even minor details will call forth his anger. However, the usage of the preposition ἐπί with the dative does not always convey a hostile sense; e. g. Thgn. 401–402 (καιρὸς δ' ἐπὶ πᾶσιν ἄριστος / ἔργμασιν ἀνθρώπων: proper measure is best in all actions of humans), Pl. Smp. 210b (ἕν τε καὶ ταὐτὸν ἡγεῖσθαι τὸ ἐπὶ πᾶσιν τοῖς σώμασι κάλλος: to regard as one and the same the beauty attached to all bodies), Men. Asp. 153–154 (βασκαίνειν γὰρ εἰώθασί με / ἐπὶ παντί: they are used to envying me about everything). For an exhaustive list of parallel cases where the preposition ἐπί takes the dative of πᾶς see Headlam (1922) 131–132 (on Herod. 3.20).

Φιλέταιρος (Philetairos)
("Philetaerus" or "The Man fond of his Comrade(s)")

Discussion Kock 2,104, 246; Edmonds 2,328f.; PCG 2,230 & 5,551; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 305

Title Homonymous comic plays were also produced by Antiphanes (PCG 2,438), Heniochus (PCG 5,555), and Philonides (PCG 7,366); Hegesippus wrote a Φιλέταιροι (PCG 5,551), while Alexis produced a Δημήτριος ἢ Φιλέταιρος (PCG 2,48–50; cf. Arnott 1996: 155–159). It is remarkable that the production dates of these six plays (Amphis' play included) span from the late-fifth or early-fourth century (Philonides being Aristophanes' older contemporary; PA 14904, PAA 957415) down to the third century BC. However, it does not necessarily follow that all six plays dealt either with the same (historic or fictitious) person or with (different) aspects of the same subject, especially since the surviving evidence is scarce and, hence, inconclusive.

Amphis' present play-title can be interpreted in two ways: (a) as a proper name or (b) as a substantive / sobriquet. In the absence of any substantial evidence in favour of either option, both possibilities remain open and equally plausible.

(a) Regarding the first possible interpretation, it is noteworthy that Φιλέταιρος is attested as a common proper name in Athens, throughout antiquity; cf. PA 14250–14255, PAA 924475–924680. Among the most prominent so named individuals was the comic playwright and Aristophanes' son Philetaerus (PCG 7,322–332, PA 14253, PAA 924630), who won his first victory at the Lenaea between 372 and 366 BC (IRDF 2325E.38). Another well-known Philetaerus was the founder of the Attalid dynasty in Pergamon and ruler during the years 283–263 BC (though without assuming the royal title; cf. Kosmetatou 2003, Austin [2]2006: 193–216); of course, the latter cannot have been Amphis' title-figure for obvious chronological reasons. But it is possible that Amphis' play focused on an individual named Philetaerus, either an historic figure, perhaps the comic playwright, or a fictitious one. Plays evolving around – and even named after – contemporary personalities constitute a common pattern in Greek Comedy (as part of the widespread motif of ὀνομαστὶ κωμῳδεῖν). Closely parallel to Amphis' present play would be Plato's Cleophon (PCG 7,456; a satire against the homonymous Athenian politician and general; PA 8638, PAA 578250 & 578190), Aristopho' Philonides (PCG 4,10; targeting the bon viveur Philonides of Melite, PA 14907, PAA 957480; cf. Papachrysostomou 2008: 143–144), and Mnesimachus' Philippus (PCG 7,23–26; referring to Philip II of Macedon, cf. Papachrysostomou 2008: 209–220); cf.

Philemo's Pyrrhus (PCG 7,264; probably featuring the king of Epirus, cf. Dietze 1901: 10–12, Breitenbach 1908: 105–106, Bruzzese 2011: 63–66). Fairly relevant is also the satire of the rich man Callias in Eupolis' Kolakes, as well as all those cases where the satire targets a fictitious character that stands for a real-life counterpart, as in Aristophanes' Knights (with Paphlagon standing for Cleon) or Eupolis' Marikas (with the title-figure being a comic persona for Hyperbolus); cf. Aristopho's Kallonides (see Papachrysostomou 2008: 112–113). Sommerstein (1996b) lists thirteen cases where a play deals throughout – or in most part – with a particular individual. To sum up, given (i) the abundance of (more or less close) parallels, (ii) the existence of at least one well-known real-life Philetaerus (the comic poet), and (iii) that the name Philetaerus was not uncommon in Athens, there is a good case to be made for Amphis' play dealing with an individual (historic or fictitious) so named (focusing on either a single episode or a series of events relating to his life, profession, etc.). Of course, there is no parallel for a comic play featuring the name of a comic playwright in its title; yet, this is not binding and a hapax of such a case cannot be a priori excluded. Likewise, Meineke (1,326) believes that Antiphanes' Φιλέταιρος may have referred to the comic playwright, whereas Kock (2,104) rejects the idea of this being a proper name altogether.

(b) The alternative interpretation, i. e. Φιλέταιρος being meant as a sobriquet, is equally possible and stems from the very nature of this proper name. Φιλέταιρος is a speaking name, which (because of this) can also be used as a substantive to designate someone who loves, is fond of (φιλέω) his comrade(s), partisan(s), companion(s) (ἑταῖρος). In case Amphis meant the current play-title as a substantive / sobriquet, the play would evidently focus on this man and would somehow (e. g. through a series of events) demonstrate the quality conveyed by his speaking nickname. As to the number of comrades (ἑταῖροι) featuring in the play, this cannot be established with confidence; it could be just one, two or even more comrades, partisans related to and being cherished by the title-figure. The plural number of Hegesippus' play-title (Φιλέταιροι) perhaps suggests a reciprocal love between a larger group of comrades. But the case of Amphis' single number Φιλέταιρος can be argued both ways. The identity of the comrade(s) constitutes another critical issue that also cannot be answered with confidence. It could be comrades in arms (Hom. Il. 1.179, Cratin. fr. 150.1), messmates (Hom. Il. 17.577, Thgn. 115), pupils / disciples (X. Mem. 2.8.1, Arist. Metaph. 985^{b}4, Alex. fr. 23.15), political partisans (Ar. Lys. 1153, Th. 8.48, D. 21.20, Lys. 12.43), lovers (Simon. 7.49, Ar. Ec. 911, Anaxil. fr. 22.16), or simply companions – in any notional variation, literal or figurative (Hom. Il. 9.2; Ar. Ach. 263, Pax 1131–1132). The one surviving fragment from Amphis' play features a dinner context (cf. "Interpretation"), but it would be unwise to use this as evidence for identifying the comrade(s) as messmate(s), especially given Athenaeus' selective reasons for citation (cf. "Citation Context").

fr. 35 (35 K.)

ἔχειν καθαρείως ἐγχελύδιόν τι καὶ γλαυκινιδίου κεφάλαια καὶ λαβρακίου τεμάχια

1 καθαρείως Cobet: καθαρίως A ἐνκελίδιον A: corr. Mus.

To be frugal and have a little eel, small glaukos-heads, and tiny sea-bass slices

Ath. 7.295f
καὶ ἐν Φιλεταίρῳ· ἔχειν —— τεμάχια and in "Philetaerus" (or) "The Man fond of his Comrade(s)": "To —— slices"

Metre Iambic trimeter

1. ⏑–⏑⏑– –|–⏑– ⏑–⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
2. –⏑⏑⏑– ⏑⏑–⏑|– ⏑–⏑– (hepththemimeral caesura)
3. ⏑⏑⏑×

Discussion Meineke 3,316f.; Bothe 486; Kock 2,247; Edmonds 2,328f.; PCG 2,230; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 305

Citation Context The present fragment is cited in Book 7 of Athenaeus' Deipnosophistae, immediately after and within the same context as Amphis fr. 16 (cf. comm. ad loc.), within a lengthy discussion about various kinds of fish (begun at 7.277c). The banqueters enlist multiple species of fish and do not miss out on displaying their erudition by quoting numerous fragments for every single species. Amphis' fragments are quoted for featuring γλαῦκος (a greyish species of fish; fr. 16) and its diminutive γλαυκινίδιον (fr. 35).

Constitution of Text In l. 1 Cobet (1858: 77–78) corrected καθαρίως preserved by codex A into καθαρείως. Cobet points out that later grammarians preferred the reading with the iota (καθαρίως), instead of the older reading with the diphthong (καθαρείως); this caused confusion, textual errors, and metrical abnormalities especially in poetic texts, such as the present one and also Eub. fr. 109.1, Ephipp. fr. 15.3, etc.; cf. LSJ[9] s. v. What is more, in l. 1 Musurus emended the unintelligible ἐνκελίδιον into ἐγχελύδιόν.

Interpretation The speaker is a miser. He probably gives instructions / orders to another comic character concerning how to buy fish and to provide as frugally as possible for an upcoming dinner. The speaker's stinginess is phenomenal and is made manifest by the fact that within less than two and a half lines he uses four diminutives (ἐγχελύδιον, γλαυκινιδίου, λαβρακίου, and τεμάχια), along with an adverb that denotes frugality (καθαρείως). But what is especially remarkable here is that the speaker paradoxically tries to be parsimonious on a kind of foodstuff that is by definition expensive – at times even exorbitantly so – i. e. fish (cf. Amphis fr. 30 "Interpretation"). He obviously cannot (or does not want to) do without fish, hence he tries to minimise the expenses by requesting fish of the smallest possible size. One of the fish species that he asks for is eel, the most expensive and most desirable of all fish (cf. Ar. Ach. 962, Antiph. fr. 145). It is obvious that the speaker would like to look prestigious and opulent by serving fish at dinner (even the finest species, eel), but is not willing to pay much for this. It is noteworthy that the diminutive γλαυκινίδιον is a rather peculiarly formed hapax, forged by Amphis ad hoc, possibly as a means of communicating the speaker's anxiety over the forthcoming expenses; an anxiety so great and uncontrollable that causes him to make grammatical mistakes when speaking.

The fragment is heavily reminiscent of two other Middle Comedy fragments; Ephipp. fr. 15 and Mnesim. fr. 3, both quoted – in that order – by Athenaeus 8.359a-d. The speaker in Ephippus' fragment is a μικρολόγος (twofold sense: stingy & addicted to diminutives), who orders his slave to purchase food (including fish); in so doing he uses six diminutives (including ἐγχελύδια) along with the adverb καθαρείως (frugally). Athenaeus' comment ad loc. (8.359a) is instructive: κατασμικρύνων ἅπαντα (minimising everything; i. e. using diminutives throughout). Mnesimachus fr. 3 features a dialogue snapshot between an allegedly spendthrift nephew and his stingy uncle. In an interesting variation of the diminutives-pattern, the uncle asks his nephew to use at least the diminutive form of words when asking for things, so that he can fool himself with the idea that the expenses are lesser (see Papachrysostomou 2008: 183–186). Cf. Eub. fr. 109 and Nicostr.Com. fr. 4.

Giving orders or instructions to slaves, assistants, or other comic characters is a comic topos; see Amphis fr. 7 ("Interpretation", with further parallels).

Metre It is noteworthy that the upsilon in ἐγχελύδιον is long (- ῡ -), although in ἔγχελυς (and also in compounds, e. g. ἐγχελυοτρόφος, ἐγχελυωπός) it is always short (-ŭ-). The only other occurrence of ἐγχελύδιον is in Ephipp. fr. 15.6 (ἐγχελύδια), where upsilon is long again.

1a ἔχειν This infinitive may have been part of an expression relating to dinner, e. g. Sopat. fr. 18.1 ἀμφὶ δείπνοις ὀξίδ' ἀργυρᾶν ἔχει (for dinner parties he has a silver vinegar-cruet), Thphr. Char. 3.2 (ὧν εἶχεν ἐπὶ τῷ δείπνῳ; of what he had for dinner), Lib. Or. 7.3 ἐπὶ δεῖπνα πάντα ἔχοντα πλὴν ἀμβροσίας καὶ νέκταρος (having at dinner parties anything but ambrosia and nectar).

1b καθαρείως On the term's orthography see "Citation Context". The adverb καθαρείως can mean cleanly, tidily (e. g. X. Cyr. 1.3.8), but also frugally, as in the present fragment; cf. LSJ[9] s. v. The expression μὴ πολυτελῶς, ἀλλὰ καθαρείως (not lavishly, but frugally) occurs in Eub. fr. 109.1, Ephipp. fr. 15.3, and Nicostr.Com. 4.2, in a combination of tautology and hendiadys – for obvious reasons of emphasis on saving money.

1c ἐγχελύδιον Little eel; diminutive of ἔγχελυς. This diminutive occurs only here and in Ephipp. fr. 15.3, in a context that closely parallels the present fragment; a skinflint employs a series of diminutives whilst giving instructions about parsimonious shopping for fish (cf. "Interpretation" above). Another diminutive of ἔγχελυς occurs in Antiph. fr. 221.4 (ἐγχέλειον), in a fragment that also features the fish diminutives γλαυκίδιον and λαβράκιον.

Fish was universally regarded as the luxury food par excellence (cf. Amphis fr. 26 comm. s. v. ὄψον, and Amphis fr. 30 "Interpretation"), and eels were the crown jewel; see Oder in RE I.1 s. v. Aal, Thompson (1947) 58–61, Davidson (1997) 8–10, Olson & Sens (2000) 48–53 (comm. on Archestr. fr. 10). Eels are considered an exceptional delicacy in Aristophanes (e. g. Ach. 880–894, where Dicaeopolis goes into raptures over one from Lake Copais in Boeotia; Id. Pax 1005, Lys. 35–36), and throughout Greek Comedy (e. g. Stratt. fr. 45.3–4, Antiph. frr. 191.1 and 216.2, Eub. fr. 36.3, Philetaer. fr. 13.4); accordingly, they were highly priced; in Ar. Ach. 962 they are priced at three drachmas, while in Antiph. fr. 145.5 at twelve drachmas. Within the text of Athenaeus eels are praised for their exceptional taste; in 7.298b we are told that αἱ ἐγχέλεις εὐχυλότεραι πάντων εἰσὶν ἰχθύων καὶ εὐστομαχίᾳ διαφέρουσι τῶν πλείστων· πλήσμιαι γάρ εἰσι καὶ πολύτροφοι (eels produce better chulē than any other fish and are easier on the stomach than most, because they are filling and nourishing), and shortly afterwards (7.298d) eels are described as ἡ τῶν δείπνων Ἑλένη (the Helen of dinner parties). Herodotus (2.72), Anaxandrides (fr. 40.5; cf. Millis 2001: 160–168), and Antiphanes (fr. 145), provide us with a piece of otherwise unattested information: that the Egyptians considered the eel to be sacred.

2a γλαυκινιδίου Little-glaukos. This is a hapax diminutive of the fish species γλαῦκος (the appellation γλαῦκος was used to designate two different fish species, both of greyish colour; cf. Amphis fr. 16 s. v. γλαῦκοι). The standard diminutives of γλαῦκος are γλαυκίσκος (Arched. fr. 3, Bato fr. 5.16, Damox. fr. 2.18) and γλαυκίδιον (Antiph. fr. 221). The formation of this hapax diminutive is rather idiosyncratic, since an extra -ιν- is inserted between the root (γλαυκ-) and the standard diminutive suffix -ίδιον. Comparable is the case of the diminutive κορακινίδιον (< κορακῖνος: a fish species of black colour), attested in Pherecr. fr. 62.1, and as v.l. in Anaxandr. fr. 28.1; see Locker 1933.

2b κεφάλαια The neuter of the adjective κεφάλαιος is commonly used substantively, as a synonym to the noun κεφαλή, designating the head and/or parts of/about the head typically of fish (though not exclusively so; cf. Ar. Nu. 981, of a head of radish). In the present fragment it is the heads of little-glaukos that are mentioned as a dinner must-have; glaukos' heads are also considered a sought-after delicacy in Bato fr. 5.16–18 and Sotad. fr. 1.5. Fish heads (of any species) are commonly mentioned as a dainty in Comedy; e.g. Ar. fr. 380 (κρανίον λάβρακος: sea-bass head), Call. fr. 6.1 (θύννου τε κεφάλαιον: tuna head), Antiph. fr. 45 (κρανίον σινόδοντος: sea-bream head), Arched. fr. 3.2 (γόγγρου … κεφαλὴν: conger eel's head).

2c λαβρακίου This is the diminutive of λάβραξ, the sea-bass. The diminutive λαβράκιον occurs only here and in Antiph. fr. 221.2. The fish species λάβραξ was so named allegedly because of its greed (λαβρότης, cf. λαβεῖν); Aelian (NA 1.30) describes sea-bass as ἰχθύων ὀψοφαγίστατος (the most gluttonous of fish). See Thompson (1947) 140 and van Leeuwen (1900) 70. Athenaeus cites much relevant information in 7.310f-311e. Miletus was famous for producing the best sea-bass; cf. Archestr. fr. 46.1–9 (cf. Olson & Sens 2000: 181–185). Aristophanes in Eq. 361 uses sea-bass' alleged rapacity and greed to construct a metaphor targeting Cleon (about a bribery case involving the Milesians; the details of the incident are not known).

3 τεμάχια Diminutive of τέμαχος (deriving from τέμνω: to cut), which means a slice of fish. This is the fourth consecutive diminutive in this fragment; on the accumulation of diminutives see "Interpretation". The diminutive τεμάχιον occurs twice more in Comedy, in Arched. fr. 3.2 γόγγρου … τεμάχια (conger eel's slices), and Crobyl. fr. 8.3 τὸν λάρυγγ' ἥδιστα πυριῶ τεμαχίοις (I love giving my throat a steam-bath with fish slices). While the term τόμος (piece, slice; also deriving from τέμνω) is mostly used in relation to meat, and occasionally bread/cake and other foodstuffs (e.g. Ar. Eq. 1190 πλακοῦντος πίονος τόμον: a piece of luscious cake; Alex. fr. 137 χορδαρίου τόμος: a slice of sausage; Mnesim. fr. 4.14 τόμος ἀλλᾶντος, τόμος ἠνύστρου: a slice of sausage, a slice of tripe), the term τέμαχος is exclusively preserved for fish; e.g. Ar. Nu. 339 κεστρᾶν τεμάχη (mullet slices), Ephipp. fr. 12.1 θύννου τεμάχη (tuna slices), Antiph. fr. 221.6 θύννου τέμαχος (tuna slice), Archestr. fr. 38.5 (of tuna again; cf. with Olson & Sens 2000: 161). However, in later texts, the term τέμαχος is also used – though sporadically – in relation to meat as well; e. g. Philostr. VA 1.21, Poll. 6.33. But the grammarian Phrynichus remains adamant regarding the distinction between τόμος and τέμαχος (Ecl. 12): τόμος κρέως ἢ πλακοῦντος· τὸ δὲ τέμαχος μόνον ἐπὶ ἰχθύος λέγεται (τόμος of meat or of cake; for τέμαχος is used only for fish).

Incertarum fabularum fragmenta

fr. 36 (36 K.)

(A.) ποδαπὸς σύ; φράσον. (B.) Ἀκάνθιος. (A.) εἶτα πρὸς θεῶν οἴνου πολίτης ὢν κρατίστου στρυφνὸς εἶ καὶ τοὔνομ' αὐτὸ τῆς πατρίδος ἐν τοῖς τρόποις ἔχεις, τὰ δ' ἤθη τῶν πολιτῶν οὐκ ἔχεις;

1 σύ Elmsley ad E. Ba. 654 p. 85: εἶ CE

(A.) Where are you from? Tell me. (B.) I am Acanthian. (A.) So then, by the gods, although you are a fellow citizen of the finest wine, you are harsh and you display your country's name in your manners, but you do not have the morale of the (country's) citizens

Ath. (epit.) 1.30e-f ἐπαινεῖ Ἄμφις καὶ τὸν ἐξ Ἀκάνθου πόλεως οἶνον λέγων· ποδαπὸς — ἔχεις Amphis praises wine from the city of Acanthus as well, saying: "(A.) Where — citizens?"

Metre Iambic trimeter

1. ⏑⏑–⏑|⏑⏑ ⏑–⏑⏑– ⏑–⏑– (triemimeral caesura)
2. ––⏑– –|–⏑– ––⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
3. ––⏑– ⏑|–⏑⏑⏑ ––⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
4. ⏑–⏑– –|–⏑– ––⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)

Discussion Meineke 3,317; Bothe 486; Kock 2,247; Edmonds 2,328f.; PCG 2,230; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 305f.

Date ca. 382 BC (so Edmonds 2,329)

Edmonds believes that the play and the reference to Acanthus (a city in eastern Chalcidice) are not irrelevant to recent historic events. In particular, he suggests that the play should be dated around 382 BC, since at that time the city of Acanthus secured Sparta's support against the Chalcidean League, which was friendly to Athens. Though intriguing, Edmond's suggestion is unprovable. Yet, if we follow his argument through, we need to consider the year 382 BC as a terminus post quem for this unknown play's production. See "Interpretation" below.

Citation Context This fragment is preserved only in Athenaeus' Epitome, hence the omission of the title (on the Epitome see Arnott 2000). Athenaeus' introductory remarks at the beginning of Book 1 touch upon various sympotic issues, wine being one of them. Following several sporadic references to it (e. g. 1.10a alluding to Hom. Il. 11.638–641; 1.25f quoting Pi. O. 9.48–49 and Eub. fr. 122; etc.), discussion focuses exclusively on wine from 1.28d onwards. Numerous kinds of wines originating from all over the Greek world (especially – though not exclusively – from various islands, like Chios, Thasos, Lesbos, etc.), but also from Italy and Phoenicia, are mentioned and praised for their distinct quality and taste. The exquisite wine (κράτιστος) from the city of Acanthus (strangely not mentioned anywhere else as being special) is the reason why Athenaeus quotes Amphis' present fragment. On wine in Athenaeus see Brock & Wirtjes 2000 (featuring an interesting appendix).

Constitution of Text In l. 1 the codices C and E preserve the unmetrical reading εἶ. Elmsley (1821: 85), whilst arguing in favour of the reading σύ (instead of εἶ) for E. Ba. 654 (σοφὸς σοφὸς σύ, πλὴν ἃ δεῖ σ' εἶναι σοφόν), compares the case of Amphis' present fragment, where he suggests that σύ should also be read instead of εἶ. Yet, the expression ποδαπὸς σύ is unparalleled (the closest comparable case is Luc. Vit. Auct. 3 ποδαπὸς εἶ σύ), whereas ποδαπὸς εἶ is attested elsewhere, e. g. [E.] Rh. 682, Men. Mis. 31, Luc. Vit. Auct. 8. Nonetheless, the existence of parallels is not always a decisive factor; since the reading εἶ unsettles the metre, the reading σύ should be unreservedly adopted instead.

Interpretation The fragment features a snapshot from a dialogue between character A (perhaps an Athenian) and character B, a citizen of Acanthus. Character A is trying to ascertain the identity of character B; the fact that A specifically asks about B's origin (ποδαπός), rather than simply asking who he is (using the interrogative pronoun τίς), suggests that B's non-Athenian identity was somehow perceptible (e. g. perhaps through his dialect and/or clothing). A's question about B's origin is a piece of information that one would reasonably ask at the beginning of a conversation with a newcomer; hence, one can logically assume that A and B have just met – with B probably having just entered the stage – and that these are among the first words they exchange. Yet, A describes B as being harsh (στρυφνός), which makes one wonder how A could have already evaluated B's character, if he had just laid eyes on him. Two possible interpretations – though not the only ones – are the following:

(i) A's characterisation of B as harsh does not derive from A's meticulous evaluation of B's temperament (e. g. following B's conduct during some past event), but it is rather an impassioned and disproportionate reaction triggered perhaps in part by some incident(s) recently experienced by A (which left him agitated) and in part by B – either by some aspect of his appearance, comprehensible only visually (e. g. a grumpy, austere mask), or by a harsh comment/order that he briefly made upon entering the stage addressing e. g. a mute slave accompanying him.

(ii) Character A may be a leader of some sort (king, general, etc.), to whom B's harsh actions/behaviour have been reported. As A confronts B meeting him for the first time, he asks him about his origins, being already aware of his harsh ways.

Option (i) would fit in a plot reminiscent of the second part of Aristophanes' Acharnians (719ff.), where seven figures (a Megarian, an informer (συκοφάντης), a Theban, Nicarchus, Lamachus' slave, Dercetes, and a best man) consecutively visit Dicaeopolis' newly established private market. Noteworthy is l. 818, where the informer asks the Megarian ὦνθρωπε, ποδαπός (taking for granted that he is non-Athenian, since this is obvious by his dialect), whereas in l. 1048 Dicaeopolis asks the best man τίς οὑτοσί; τίς οὑτοσί (who are you?), for the latter's Athenian origin is obvious; for an in-depth analysis of the issue of dialects in Aristophanes see Colvin 1999.

The present fragment may have belonged to any one of Amphis' twenty-eight known plays. No play seems to have had any particular relation with Acanthus and eastern Chalcidice, whilst wine could naturally feature in every single one of them. A στρυφνός, harsh, grumpy character may have also been accommodated in any of Amphis' plays; the distressed figure (ἀνιώμενος) in fr. 34 (from "The Loving Siblings") or the troubled character in fr. 3 (from "The Vinedresser") are just two of many possible candidates.

Yet, what really matters here is not so much the fragment's origin, but the intriguing fact that this fragment, along with an indirect reference in Thucydides (4.84), are the only testimonies we possess regarding the finest wine (κράτιστος) produced in the city of Acanthus, in Chalcidice. According to Edmonds (cf. "Date"), the present reference to Acanthus is to be interpreted in relation to recent historic events.

The city of Acanthus (Ἄκανθος, ὁ) was a colony of the island of Andros, located on the eastern peninsula of Chalcidice (the Athos peninsula), in northern Greece (Th. 4.84). During the Peloponnesian War, in the summer of 424 BC, the Spartan general Brasidas managed, after a short siege, to win the city over and persuaded its citizens to secede from the Athenian alliance (Th. 4.84–88, 4.114, 4.120); see Rhodes (2006) 37. It is within this context that we hear for the first time about the Acanthians' wine-industry; Thucydides mentions that Brasidas purposely set out against Acanthus before the vintage season (πρὸ τρυγήτου; Th. 4.84); as a result – acutely foreseen by the Spartan general – the people of Acanthus did not linger in deliberation, but promptly consented to Brasidas' proposals, for they had fears concerning the grapes, which had not yet been gathered (δὲ διὰ τοῦ καρποῦ τὸ δέος ἔτι ἔξω ὄντος πεισθὲν τὸ πλῆθος). Thucydides' testimony implies that wine-industry was the most crucial economic activity for Acanthus. Strangely, as already mentioned, apart from Thucydides' reference and Amphis present fragment, we have no other record of Acanthian wine, let alone any description of it as being of fine quality (οἴνου κρατίστου), as the comic character argues. Understandably, Brasidas' siege of Acanthus in 424 BC was not any longer topical for Amphis and his audience; yet, Acanthus became once again a tug of war between Athens and Sparta in the first quarter of the fourth century BC. In 382 BC Acanthus sent an embassy to Sparta asking the latter's support against its forced inclusion in the Chalcidian League, which was friendly to Athens (X. HG 5.2.11–19). The Spartans intervened, fought against the Chalcidians, and caused the dissolution of the Chalcidian League (X. HG 5.2.20–21, 5.2.37–39, 5.3.18–26).

Indeed, it is intriguing to assume that the reference to Acanthus in the present fragment is not accidental, but was meant by Amphis as a political comment on recent events. If so, this would mean – above all – that here we have a rare case of resurgence of Old Comedy's political element during the fourth century BC (see Webster [2]1970: 37–56; Nesselrath 1990: 218–221, 225; Papachrysostomou 2008: 209–220; Papachrysostomou 2009). However, there is no adequate evidence to support this approach; in addition, the date (immediately / shortly after 382 BC), though not incompatible with Amphis' floruit, is a slighly early one (cf. Intro. 2 "Chronology / Career"). Certainty is impossible.

1a Ἀκάνθιος Citizen of Acanthus. See "Interpretation".

1b εἶτα See comm. on Amphis fr. 1.1a s. v. εἶτ' οὐ.

2a οἴνου πολίτης The speaker considers the city of Acanthus synonymous with wine-production and, by synecdoche, synonymous with (if not a personification of) wine itself; hence, he thinks of the citizens of Acanthus as citizens of the wine-city, fellow citizens of wine. The assimilation of a group of people (fellow citizens, demesmen, etc.) with a distinctive feature that stands out as a defining attribute of this group's essential nature is a pattern reminiscent of two well-known Aristophanic scenes. In Acharnians 331–336 Dicaeopolis threatens to slay a coal basket (λάρκος), whom the chorus members (coal burners by profession) consider one of their demesmen; l. 333 ὁ λάρκος δημότης ὅδ' ἔστ' ἐμός (that coal basket is a member of my deme), and l. 336 ἀπολεῖς ἄρ' ὁμήλικα τόνδε φιλανθρακέα; (are you going to kill this coeval coal-fellow of mine?). Likewise, in Thesmophoriazusae 688–764 the Kinsman snaps away and later slaughters Mica's baby, which turns out to be a skin full of wine; excessive wine-drinking being a major vice stereotypically associated with women (Th. 735): ὦ θερμόταται γυναῖκες, ὦ ποτίσταται (women, you overheated dipsomaniacs).

Lloyd-Jones (1965) discerns the same pattern in a fragmentary epigram of the Hellenistic period (Pap. Dubl. inv. 193) that refers to Archilochus and his notorious conflict with Lycambes (i. e. to Parian natives); Lloyd-Jones interprets the phrase λίθος πολίτης found in this fragment (col. i.5) as referring to the inhabitants of the island of Paros, which was universally renowned for its fine marble (i. e. "the stone, our fellow-citizen"). He also cites Amphis' present fragment, along with A. Th. 253 (θεοὶ πολῖται: gods of the city) and Ar. Ec. 574 (πολίτην δῆμον: the city's people) as parallel cases, although I believe only Amphis' text can be considered a parallel; the other two passages are not examples of this rare pattern and are wrongly cited by Lloyd-Jones.

2b στρυφνός This adjective can be used literally to describe foodstuffs as being sour, astringent (e. g. μῆλα: apples in Antiph. fr. 186.3; and γάλα: milk in Sor. 1.91), and also metaphorically to refer to sour/harsh temperament and manners (e. g. Ar. V. 877 στρυφνὸν καὶ πρίνινον ἦθος: harsh and hardhearted disposition; X. Cyr. 2.2.11); cf. Gal. 8.691 οὕτω καὶ ἄνθρωπον μὲν στρυφνὸν ἐκ μεταφορᾶς, οἶνον δὲ στρυφνὸν οὐκέτ' ἐκ μεταφορᾶς (so a person can be sour by metaphor, while wine can be sour literally). Given its twofold sense, the use of this adjective is most apposite in Amphis' present fragment, since it simultaneously refers to the character of the Acanthian citizen as being στρυφνός (metaphorically sour), as opposed to the Acanthian wine that is anything but στρυφνός (literally sour). References to στρυφνὸς οἶνος occur regularly in medical texts (i. e. as medicine), e. g. Hp. Nat. Mul. 33, Aff. Int. 22; Gal. 10.327, 13.312; Dsc. 5.6.3; etc.

3 τοὔνομ' αὐτὸ τῆς πατρίδος Speaker A creates a witty word-play out of the city's name (Ἄκανθος, ὁ), which puns on the term ἄκανθα (ἡ) that means thorn, prickle, and can designate any thorny or prickly plant. Hence, the city of Acanthus can be playfully interpreted as the thorny city or the city of the people with thorny/harsh characters. This is exactly what speaker A accuses speaker B of; i. e. of having harsh, prickly manners (τρόποι; cf. next note) that correspond to his city's name.

3–4 τρόποις … ἤθη A clear-cut distinction is drawn here between τρόποι (manners, behaviour) and ἤθη (customs). The term τρόποι is meant as an individual display of temperament by a single person on a single, random occasion; as such, τρόποι can be variable (depending on the person's mood), unpredictable, and, above all, temporary (cf. comm. on Amphis fr. 1.4a). On the contrary, the term ἤθη designates an orderly code of behaviour that is well-established and deeply-rooted within a community's collective ego. Τρόποι stand for a person's character and, hence, can be erratic, whereas ἤθη stand for the ethos and principles of an entire community (whether a city or a nation) and, hence, are largely unwavering and fixed. Accordingly, in the present fragment, speaker A reasonably claims to be aware of the ἤθη of Acanthus, which he finds to be in disaccord with speaker's B current display of manners. Of course, the present distinction between τρόποι and ἤθη is not universally applied; elsewhere, the terms are used interchangeably or can bear slightly different notional nuances; e. g. Eub. fr. 38 σφόδρ' ἐστὶ τοὺς τρόπους Βοιώτιος (his behaviour is thoroughly Boeotian), Pl. Lg. 896c τρόποι δὲ καὶ ἤθη καὶ βουλήσεις καὶ λογισμοὶ καὶ δόξαι ἀληθεῖς (moods and dispositions and wishes and calculations and true opinions), etc. Cf. LSJ[9] s. vv.

fr. 37 (37 K.)

οὐκ ἔστιν, ὡς ἔοικε, φάρμακον μέθης οὐδὲν τοιοῦτον ὡς τὸ προσπεσεῖν ἄφνω λύπην τιν'. οὕτως ἐξελαύνει γὰρ σφόδρα τὸν οἶνον ὥστε τὰς ῥαφάνους λῆρον δοκεῖν

3–4 <ταχύ>/σφόδρα, λῆρον Dobree Adv. II p. 295 4 Kaibel: λῆρον ὥστε τὰς ῥαφάνους οὕτω (ὄντως Casaub.) δοκεῖν CE, PCG

It seems there is no cure for drunkenness, as effective as having some grief suddenly fall upon you; for it drives wine out so rigorously that it makes cabbage look like nonsense

Ath. (epit.) 1.34e
Ἄμφις· οὐκ —— δοκεῖν

Amphis: "It —— nonsense"

Metre Iambic trimeter

1. ——⏑— ⏑—⏑|— ⏑—⏑— (hephthemimeral caesura)
2. ——⏑— ⏑|—⏑— ⏑—⏑— (penthemimeral caesura)
3. ——⏑— —|—⏑— ——⏑— (penthemimeral caesura)
4. ——⏑— ⏑|—⏑⏑— ——⏑— (penthemimeral caesura)

Discussion Meineke 3,317; Bothe 487; Kock 2,247; Edmonds 2,328f.; PCG 2,231; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 306

Citation Context Book 1 of Deipnosophistae concludes with the citation of Amphis' present fragment. This is the fourth (and final) fragment that Athenaeus cites, in order to demonstrate that (1.34d) τὴν κράμβην ῥάφανον ἐκάλουν οἱ παλαιοί (the ancients [i. e. in the Attic dialect] referred to cabbage (krambē) as rhaphanos). Prior to Amphis' fragment Athenaeus cites Apollod. Car. fr. 32, Anaxandr. fr. 59, and Nicoch. fr. 18, which also attest to the Attic usage of the term ῥάφανος to denote the cabbage. It is noteworthy that the fragments by Anaxandrides, Nicochares (cf. Orth 2015: 96–99), and Amphis additionally testify to cabbage's alleged ability to relieve drunkenness and hangover (cf. also Alex. fr. 287 and Eub. 124, also cited by Athenaeus in the immediately preceding section); see comm. s. v. φάρμακον μέθης. Unsurprisingly, the play-titles of all these fragments are missing, since this is the Epitome part of Athenaeus' work (see Arnott 2000).

Constitution of Text Line 4, as preserved by the codices C and E, is unmetrical (lacking the initial anceps element); in addition, the delayed position of the conjunction ὥστε is irregular (following λῆρον, instead of preceding it in introducing the subordinate result clause): λῆρον ὥστε τὰς ῥαφάνους οὕτω δοκεῖν. Kassel-Austin (and Olson in his 2006–2012 edition of Athenaeus) adopt Epitome's reading and print line 4 with a crux at its beginning. However, I choose to adopt Kaibel's suggestion instead (τὸν οἶνον ὥστε τὰς ῥαφάνους λῆρον δοκεῖν) for a number of reasons: (i) it gives a metrically correct line; (ii) it provides for a syntactically correct position of ὥστε (at the beginning of the subordinate clause); (iii) it gets rid of the suspicious repetition (perhaps a result of dittography) of οὕτως in l. 3 and οὕτω in l. 4 (a repetition that Casaubon tried to remove by suggesting the reading ὄντως instead); and (iv) it supplies an object in the accusative (τὸν οἶνον) for the verb ἐξελαύνει (for which otherwise we would need to assume μέθην in accusative).

A different remedy for the text has been suggested by Dobree (Adv. II 295), who adds ταχύ in l. 3, and subsequently moves σφόδρα in l. 4. I prefer Kaibel's conjecture over Dobree's, for the latter's reconstruction leaves both οὕτως (l. 3) and οὕτω (l. 4) in the text, as well as ὥστε in delayed position (rather than at the beginning of the result clause); additionally, it could be argued that the simultaneous and adjacent presence of ταχύ and σφόδρα in the text notionally borders with tautology. Regarding the delayed positon of ὥστε, Dobree refers to Porson (Adv. 233), who notes a parallel, E. Hec. 341 τὴν σὴν ὥστ' ἐποικτῖραι τύχην (so that he may take pity on your fate). However, Euripides' and Amphis' cases are not exactly parallel; the possessive pronoun with the article (τὴν σὴν) that escapes the boundaries of the result clause in Euripides is notionally drawn back within the subordinate clause due to its straightforward connection with τύχην. On the contrary, in Amphis' case λῆρον is entirely cut off from the result clause and remains a syntactically irregular and unparalleled structure.

Interpretation The opening of the fragment suggests that this is the beginning of a soliloquy (see Amphis fr. 3 "Interpretation" and comm. on l. 1). The speaker argues that the best remedy for drunkenness is to come across some unexpected grief (as opposed to the consumption of cabbage). What the speaker says seems to be deriving from either a personal experience or an event experienced by another person that is somehow close to the speaker (relative, friend, master-slave relation, etc.). It could be argued that the fragment provides us with some clues regarding the play's plot so far; a feast / drinking-bout has taken place, then something unpleasant and painful happened (λύπην τιν') unexpectedly (ἄφνω), which abruptly brought the festive spirit to an end and shook the effect of wine out of all participants, and especially the one (possibly the protagonist) who experienced the grief. It is likely that the speaker was not the one directly affected by the affliction, since (instead of e. g. being busy attending to and/or being emotionally overwhelmed by it) he could spare some time contemplating what has happened (the element of abstract and/or quasi-philosophising contemplation is stereotypically present in parallel cases; cf. Papachrysostomou 2012–2013a: 167–173, and Amphis fr. 3). The way the speaker ponders whilst (probably) soliloquising is reminiscent of Onesimus' speech in Men. Epit. 878–907, who comments on the melancholic and unsettling behaviour of his master Charisius. Of course, it is impossible to attribute Amphis' present fragment to any specific play. Yet, having said that, the context of the present fragment could have arguably been the same to that of fr. 34 (from "The Loving Siblings"); the present λύπη may be the reason why the person described in fr. 34 is distressed (ἀνιώμενος). It is conceivable that the speaker in fr. 34 and fr. 37 is the same and that both fragments were originally parts of a long soliloquy of his (possibly a slave reporting and commenting on his master's state). But, in the absence of further evidence, this should remain just one of many possibilities.

The cabbage as a remedy for drunkenness and its handling by Amphis constitutes an issue worthy of discussion. First, the way the speaker rejects this treatment (i. e. without explaining it but merely referring to it in passing) strongly suggests that this alleged antidote to excessive drinking was widely known to contemporary audience. Indeed, it was universally believed that the consumption of boiled cabbage could work both as a cure for drunkenness and as a prophylactic measure if consumed before drinking wine. Athenaeus (1.34c) reports that this practice was popular among the Egyptians and the Sybarites (for the latter he quotes Timaeus, FGrH 566 F 47). Next (1.34c-e) he cites four comic fragments, Alex. fr. 287 (cf. Arnott 1996: 91), Eub. 124,

Anaxandr. fr. 59, and Nicoch. fr. 18, all of which feature this practice and corroborate its effectiveness. Intriguingly, Amphis' present fragment is the only suriviving passage that categorically refutes the de-/anti-toxicating effect of cabbage. Instead, the comic character introduces a rationalized approach to the problem; he confidently declares that all the fuss about cabbage is absolutely nonsense (λῆρον) and that the antidote to drunkenness is simply to get stricken by some unexpected grief or affliction. The meaning is that the shocking effect exercised by some sudden misfortune upon a drunk person is so intense and overwhelming that it can even shake drunkenness out of him and force him to start thinking sensibly again. This rationalized approach comes with a twist. What we essentially have here is a reversal of reality, since the antidote for drunkenness (μέθη) is said to be λύπη, unhappiness, affliction, suffering, i. e. the precise condition for which wine was universally considered the best available remedy; cf. S. fr. 758 (TrGF 4,527) τὸ μεθύειν πημονῆς λυτήριον (getting drunk is the deliverance from suffering), X. Sym. 2.24 ὁ οἶνος τὰς μὲν λύπας κοιμίζει (wine lulls our pains to sleep), Gal. 4.777, etc. The archetypical and perhaps most famous description of wine as cure for humans' grief occurs in Teiresias' speech in Euripides' Bacchae 266–327; esp. 278–283 ὁ Σεμέλης γόνος / βότρυος ὑγρὸν πῶμ' ηὗρε κἀσηνέγκατο / θνητοῖς, ὃ παύει τοὺς ταλαιπώρους βροτοὺς / λύπης, ὅταν πλησθῶσιν ἀμπέλου ῥοῆς, / ὕπνον τε λήθην τῶν καθ' ἡμέραν κακῶν / δίδωσιν, οὐδ' ἔστ' ἄλλο φάρμακον πόνων (the son of Semele discovered the drink that flows from the grape cluster and introduced it to mortals. It is this that frees trouble-laden mortals from their pain, when they fill themselves with the juice of the vine, this that gives sleep to make one forget the day's troubles; there is no other treatment for misery). Likewise, in Euripides' Alcestis Heracles prompts the slave (794–795) to lay aside his excessive grief and have some wine (οὔκουν τὴν ἄγαν λύπην ἀφεὶς / πίῃ μεθ' ἡμῶν). Heracles' attitude in this Euripidean scene (773–860) is instructive, for it practically exemplifies the comic character's point in Amphis' fragment; i. e. Heracles, being in an obvious state of euphoria and intoxication (cf. ll. 773–802, esp. 788) following the entertainment offered to him by Admetus (cf. ll. 546–548), exhibits ebullient and lighthearted behaviour, and even tries to persuade the slaves to join the drinking (795). But the abrupt disclosure of Alcestis' death (l. 821) instantly shakes the mirth and the wine-induced euphoria out of Heracles, who immediately decides to take action in order to reclaim her from Hades (840ff.). Nevertheless, elsewhere in Euripides (frr. 962, 1079; NB that the reading μέθῃ in fr. 1079.4 is Valckenaer's conjecture) it is not wine but a friend's soothing advice that is recommended as a cure (φάρμακον) for grief (λύπη). Finally, in a comic tour de force, the speaker in Antiph. fr. 293.1 asserts that wine is driven out with wine: οἴνῳ τὸν οἶνον ἐξελαύνειν.

1–2 οὐκ ἔστιν … οὐδέν Typical expression commonly used to introduce a soliloquy; see comm. on Amphis fr. 3.1.

1 φάρμακον μέθης When accompanied by the genitive, the term φάρμακον normally (though not always) has the meaning of remedy/cure/antidote against something (here, against drunkenness); e. g. A. Pr. 251 τῆσδε φάρμακον νόσου (cure for this affliction), E. Andr. 272 οὐδεὶς γυναικὸς φάρμακ' ἐξηύρηκέ πω (no one has yet found a remedy against women), Phryn.Com. fr. 64 ἀμυγδαλῆ τῆς βηχὸς ἀγαθὸν φάρμακον (an almond is good medicine against a cough), AP 6.170 δίψης φάρμακ' (remedy for thirst), etc.

2 προσπεσεῖν The verb προσπίπτω (fall upon, attack) is typically used in a figurative sense to designate the (usually sudden and unexpected) occurrence of some adversity, which is thus visualised as falling upon, striking the person involved; e. g. E. Med. 225 ἐμοὶ δ' ἄελπτον πρᾶγμα προσπεσὸν τόδε (this sudden blow that has struck me), Hdt. 1.32 ἄτην μεγάλην προσπεσοῦσαν ἐνεῖκαι (to bear the stroke of great calamity), Hyp. Epit. 43 ἀπηλλαγμένοι εἰσὶ … λύπης καὶ τῶν ἄλλων τῶν προσπιπτόντων εἰς τὸν ἀνθρώπινον βίον (they have been released … from grief and from the other ills that befall human life), Ar. Ra. 309 πόθεν μοι τὰ κακὰ ταυτὶ προσέπεσεν; (whence have these woes befallen me?), etc.

3 λύπην Grief/affliction/pain that strikes abruptly (ἄφνω) is here presented as the only effective remedy for drunkenness. For the reversal of real-life perspectives on grief and wine see "Interpretation".

4a οἶνον On wine see comm. on Amphis fr. 9.3b.

4b ῥαφάνους The term ῥάφανος (ἡ) was used in the Attic dialect instead of the term κράμβη to designate the cabbage; cf. Apollod.Car. fr. 32 † εἰ δ' ὅτι † καλοῦμεν ῥάφανον, ὑμεῖς δ' οἱ ξένοι/κράμβην (if † … † we call it "rhaphanos", but you foreigners call it "krambē"); cf. "Citation Context" and Arnott (1996) 91. On cabbage as a preventive meaure and antidote to drunkenness see "Interpretation".

4c λῆρον The term λῆρος typically designates something, which either by nature is or through comparison to something else proves to be trash, nonsense, futile, of inferior quality and the like. In the present fragment, cabbage is considered an absurd antidote to drunkenness, when compared to grief. Cf. Archil. fr. 327.2 τὰ δ' ἄλλα λῆρος ἦν ἄρ' αὐτῷ (he considered everything else trifling), Ar. Lys. 860 ὅτι λῆρός ἐστι τἄλλα πρὸς Κινησίαν (compared to Cinesias, all the rest are trash), Ar. Ra. 809–810 λῆρόν τε τἄλλ' ἡγεῖτο τοῦ γνῶναι πέρι/φύσεις ποιητῶν (and the rest of them he thought were pure piffle when it comes to judging what poets really are), Xenarch. fr. 7.1 οἱ μὲν ποιηταὶ λῆρός εἰσιν (the poets are a joke).

fr. 38 (38 K.)

ὁ συκάμινος συκάμιν', ὁρᾷς, φέρει, ὁ πρῖνος ἀκύλους, ὁ κόμαρος μιμαίκυλα

1 συκάμιν' Poll.: -μίνους Ath., Eust. φέρει Ath., Eust., Poll. FS: φο ante spat. vac. duarum litt. capax A, unde φορεῖ ed. pr., sed vid. Cobet (1858) 140

The mulberry tree, you see, bears mulberries, the holm-oak acorns, the arbutus tree arbutus fruits

Ath. 2.50f (epit.)
Ἄμφις· ὁ συκάμινος — μιμαίκυλα. hinc Eust. ad Od. 1.379.32–33 (unde Cramer An.Par. I p. 396,4). Poll. 1.233 (codd. FS, A, BC; δένδρα ἔγκαρπα) συκάμινος (om. BC). ἡ δὲ μέση κωμῳδία τὸν μὲν καρπὸν (ἔστι δὲ ἐν τῇ μέσῃ κωμ. καὶ ὁ καρπὸς καὶ τὸ ὄνομα FSA) συκάμινον οὐδετέρως καλεῖ (συκ. οὐδ. καλ. om. FSA) τὸ δὲ (καὶ τὸ FSA) δένδρον ἀρρενικῶς ἐκφέρεται (ἐκφ. om. BC)· ὁ συκάμινος (defic. BC) – φέρει. pergit Pollux in enumeratione κρανία, μέσπιλα, unde tertii versus partem κράνεια μέσπιλα accrescere putabat Meineke (κράνεια Jungermann, <ἡ δ' αὖ> κράνεια Blaydes, <κράν' ἡ> κράνει', ἡ <μεσπίλη δὲ> μέσπιλα Edmonds)

Amphis: "The mulberry — fruits"

Metre Iambic trimeter

1. ⏑–⏑– –|–⏑– ⏑–⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)
2. ⏑–⏑⏑⏑ –|⏑⏑⏑– ⏑–⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)

Discussion Meineke 3,318f.; Bothe 487; Kock 2,247f.; Edmonds 2,328–331; PCG 2,231; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 306

Citation Context The fragment is cited in the Epitome of Athenaeus' Deipnosophistae (hence the omission of the play-title; cf. Arnott 2000, esp. 47–50). In Book 2 the (narrated) symposion is already under way; since 2.49d the serving of appetizers has been ongoing, and within this context a number of fruits are being named and briefly exemplified through literary quotations. Amphis' present fragment is cited in order to illustrate the arbutus fruit (μιμαίκυλα). The section on μιμαίκυλα starts at 2.50e (with a reference to Asclepiades of Myrlea FGrH 697 F 4) and includes three more comic fragments (Ar. fr. 698, Theopomp. fr. 68, Crates fr. 43), along with a reference to Theophrastus (HP 3.16.4). In addition, Eustathius (ad Od. 1.379.32–33), being interested in acorns (ἄκυλον) instead rather than μιμαίκυλα, cites Athenaeus' text, though without mentioning Amphis' name; Cramer (An.Par. I 396,4) in turn refers to Eustathius' text. What is more, Pollux (1.233), whilst studying the grammatical gender of the mulberry tree and fruit (συκάμινος, and -ον respectively), claims that Middle Comedy (sic, vaguely) attests to the masculine gender for the tree and the neuter for the fruit; and although he cites the first line of Amphis' fragment, he fails to name Amphis (Jungermann in his 1706 edition of Onomasticon was the first to detect that Amphis' text was hiding behind Pollux' words). Next Pollux continues enumerating fruits (κρανία [incorrect reading for κράνεια, first emended by Jungermann] μέσπιλα: cornelian cherries, medlars); hence, Meineke (3,318f.) thought that this (κράνεια μέσπιλα) must have been the continuation of Amphis' fragment, i. e. the beginning of a third line. Meineke's conjecture was followed by Bothe, Kock, and Edmonds (the latter adjusts the text further: <κράν' ἡ> κράνει', ἡ <μεσπίλη δὲ> μέσπιλα); likewise, Blaydes (Adv. ii.142) suggests the addition of ἡ δ' αὖ before κράνεια.

Constitution of Text In l. 1 Athenaeus and Eustathius preserve the (grammatically erroneous and currently unmetrical) reading συκαμίνους (i. e. masculine), while Pollux preserves συκάμιν' (neuter); the latter reading, which is the grammatically correct one, is also the one that scans correctly in iambic trimeter. It is significant that the reading Pollux preserves (συκάμιν') agrees with the point he makes; i. e. that in Middle Comedy the term designating mulberry (the fruit) is in the neuter form, i. e. τὸ συκάμινον (ἡ δὲ μέση κωμῳδία τὸν μὲν καρπὸν συκάμινον οὐδετέρως καλεῖ; NB that this clause is preserved only in Pollux' codices B and C, both deriving from the same exemplar; on Pollux' manuscript tradition see Intro. 3 "Tradition & Reception").

Line 1 features another critical issue; Athenaeus, Eustathius, and two codices of Pollux (F and S, deriving from the same exemplar) preserve the reading φέρει, whereas Pollux' codex A preserves the letters φο followed by a space large enough to accommodate two letters; this gave rise to the reading φορεῖ, which has been universally adopted ever since Pollux' editio princeps (April 11th 1502, by Aldus Manutius; cf. Wilson 2016: ch. xix). Meineke adopts the same reading (φορεῖ) for Athenaeus' text, though erroneously so, as Cobet points out (1858: 140): "arbores καρποὺς φέρειν dicuntur, non φορεῖν" (with parallels). Indeed, the sense of producing, bringing forth fruits and crops (for both the earth and the trees) is ubiquitously communicated by the verb φέρω (never by φορέω); cf. comm. s. v. φέρει below.

Interpretation The speaker asyndetically enumerates three types of trees (mulberry tree, holm-oak, and arbutus tree) and the fruits they correspondingly bear. In all probability, this is an excerpt from a longer catalogue; yet, neither the purpose nor the length of the original catalogue can be determined. The parenthetic ὁρᾷς (l. 1) implies that the speaker addresses someone else (who is also currently present on stage); it also makes the speaker sound reasonably learned (almost an expert in what he is talking about), as if he was showing the other person around. What is particularly strange here is that the speaker explains the obvious, at the risk of sounding redundant. The trees, their fruits, and their names are common knowledge (and so were they back then); hence, such an exposé sounds trite and meaningless – in real life. But this is not real life, this is Comedy, where reversal of reality is the norm; hence, a number of imaginative scenarios are conceivable, which could accommodate the present analysis of this otherwise self-evident knowledge. First, it is significant that elsewhere (cf. frr. 28 and 43 "Interpretation") Amphis appears to have explored Old Comedy's favourite motif of comic utopias, set in an unspecified remote past / golden (and bygone) era, where automation and cornucopia of goods feature as essential characteristics. It is conceivable that the present fragment belongs in such a utopian context (since the play-title is unknown, it is even possible that it belongs, along with frr. 28 and 43, in Amphis' Uranus). In such a case, the speaker could be explaining to e. g. a newly-arrived person (from where and how would be immaterial to ask and as much pointless as asking how the entire chorus ascends to Olympus in Aristophanes Pax 301ff.) how everything is done properly, how nature yields abundant goods, and how plants grow naturally without human intervention, i. e. through automation. An alternative scenario would be to imagine a setting in the Underworld (cf. Aristophanes' Frogs), where an old resident is presented giving a guiding tour to someone who has just died and joined the community of Hades. The speaker could be explaining (whilst pointing to trees, etc.) that the Underworld is not a dark place (as e. g. pictured in Homer) but greatly resembles the Earth, with trees growing and bearing fruits. A third possibility is to imagine that some non-human figure (e. g. an Olympian god) visits the earth for the first time and, upon arrival, some mortal shows them around. On the other hand, from a different point of view, the present fragment could be less imaginative and closer to a real-life scenario; i. e. given the existence of several banausic play-titles within Amphis' corpus (cf. Intro. 4 "Themes and Motifs"), the speaker could be a worker (perhaps a farmer from "The Vinedresser") who shows the fields he has been cultivating to his master and takes pride in stating the obvious, i. e. that everything is booming, flourishing, and bringing forth fruit. The plot possibilities of this fragment are endless.

1a ὁ συκάμινος Mulberry tree. The term is typically found in the feminine (ἡ συκάμινος); e. g. Aesop. Fab. 157 (throughout), Hp. Mul. 31, Thphr. HP 1.1.7, 5.4.2, etc. The present usage of this noun in the masculine is a hapax occurrence. It is significant that the reason why Pollux 1.233 quotes part of Amphis' fragment is precisely to demonstrate the grammatical gender of the terms designating the mulberry tree and fruit (cf. "Citation Context"). Pollux argues that the masculine gender of συκάμινος is the norm in Middle Comedy in general. But either Pollux had access to further comic material (lost to us) or his claim is mistaken, since Amphis' present usage of the term συκάμινος (regardless of gender) is the only surviving one in the entire comic genre. The occurrences συκαμίνῳ (Eub. fr. 97.2) and συκαμίνοις (Philippid. fr. 19) are instances of τὸ συκάμινον instead (dative singular and dative plural respectively), which designates the mulberry fruit; cf. next note.

1b συκάμιν' Nominative plural of the neuter noun τὸ συκάμινον, which designates the mulberry fruit (for the συκάμινος tree see previous note). The gender of this term is ubiquitously neuter. Hence, Pollux' claim that Middle Comedy uses the neuter gender must be interpreted not as a redundant and unlearned assertion, but rather as a concessive clause, i. e. "even if/ although Middle Comedy uses the neuter gender for the mulberry fruit (as the norm is), it deviates from the norm and uses the masculine form (instead of the feminine) for the mulberry tree". The erroneous (and unmetrical) reading συκαμίνους, preserved by Athenaeus and Eustathius, is unparalleled (cf. "Constitution of Text").

Within Comedy the term occurs twice more, revealing that mulberry's reddish juice/pulp was used by women as rouge (and not as a wash, as LSJ[9] s. v. state): Eub. fr. 97.2 (συκαμίνῳ τὰς γνάθους / κεχριμέναι: their cheeks smeared with mulberry juice), and Philippid. fr. 19 (τοῖς συκαμίνοις δ' ἀντὶ τοῦ φύκους ὅλον / τὸ πρόσωπον: the whole face (sc. being smeared) with mulberries instead of seaweed dye). According to several lexicographic sources, an alternative appellation for συκάμινα was μόρα (τὸ μόρον); cf. Sud. μ 1246, Phot. σ 680, Poll. 6.46, etc.; also Ath. 2.51b (claiming that the Alexandrians alone used the term μόρα; NB that in the following literary quotations it is likely that Athenaeus confuses mulberries with blackberries).

1c ὁρᾷς A colloquialism, probably originating in oral speech. It is frequently used in Comedy as a parenthetic, one-word expression, demarcated by commas. The precise meaning can vary and the expression can assume an ad hoc sense depending on the context. Starkie (1911: 93; on Ar. Nu. 355) claims that this is used "generally where there is a touch of malice"; but I disagree, for I fail to detect malice in most cases. Instead, I believe that this parenthetic usage of ὁρᾷς is typically used when the speaker – via a direct, and hence impactful, address to his collocutor – needs to emphatically confirm that his point is being thoroughly understood (i. e. "you see what I mean?") and subsequently seeks an expression of approval, agreement, consent or some other affirmative response from his collocutor; e. g. Ar. Eq. 92, Nu. 355, Th. 496, Ra. 1234, Ec. 104; Anaxandr. fr. 18.4; Alex. fr. 9.8; Men. Pk. 332; etc. The context of Amphis' present fragment is practically non-existent and, hence, the speaker's precise reasons for using ὁρᾷς are beyond recover; yet, he could be trying to stress that everything is in perfect order, and so his collocutor should be happy and satisfied. Tragic poetry occasionally features the comparable expression ὡς ὁρᾷς; e. g. A. Ag. 1597; E. Heracl. 124, Hec. 1053, Ph. 856, Cyc. 145; etc.

1d φέρει This is the verb that is used par excellence for all trees and plants, and also of the land to mean produce, yield, bring forth fruits and crops (cf. "Constitution of Text"); e. g. Hom. Od. 9.110–111 ἠδ' ἄμπελοι, αἵ τε φέρουσιν / οἶνον ἐριστάφυλον (and vines, which bear the rich clusters of wine), Hdt. 6.139 οὔτε γῆ καρπὸν ἔφερε οὔτε γυναῖκες (the land brought forth no fruit nor did the wives bear offspring), E. Hec. 593–594 γῆ μὲν κακὴ / τυχοῦσα καιροῦ θεόθεν εὖ στάχυν φέρει (a poor plot of land that gets its due rain from above bears a good harvest), etc.

2a ὁ πρῖνος Also feminine, ἡ πρῖνος. The term πρῖνος (irrespective of gender) was used to designate two akin trees of the oak family, the holm-oak ("Quercus Ilex"), and the kermes-oak ("Quercus Coccifera"); the distinction between the two is not always easy; cf. Thphr. HP 3.6.4, 3.7.3, 3.16.1, Dsc. 1.106.2 (see Baumann 1993: 48, 158–159). In Comedy πρῖνος is mentioned twice more, in Eup. fr. 13.1 (as fodder for goats), and Ar. Ra. 859 (in a metaphor assimilating raging Euripides to a burning tree).

2b ἀκύλους The term ἄκυλος (ὁ) designates the acorn, i. e. the fruit of πρῖνος (holm-oak, "Quercus Ilex"; cf. previous note); see Phot. α 879 ἄκυλος· ὁ τῆς πρίνου καρπὸς καλεῖται ὑπὸ τῶν παλαιῶν; cf. Thphr. HP 3.16.3. Acorns were used at a dinner game called τρόπα (consisting of aiming knuckle-bones or acorns at a hole); cf. Cratin. fr. 180, Poll. 9.103. They were also used as fodder for swine; cf. Hom. Od. 10.242, Arist. HA 595ᵃ28, and also Pherecr. fr. 13.

2c ὁ κόμαρος The arbutus-tree ("Arbutus unedo"), also known as the strawberry-tree. The noun is typically found in feminine form: ἡ κόμαρος. But in the present fragment the term is found in the masculine for metrical reasons (the feminine article ἡ, as a long element, would make the line unmetrical). Theophrastus HP 3.16.4 gives a detailed description of κόμαρος; cf. Ar. Av. 620.

2d μιμαίκυλα μιμαίκυλον (τό) is the arbutus fruit. The brief section that Athenaeus dedicates to μιμαίκυλα (2.50e-f, cf. "Citation Context") includes the quotation of three more comic fragments featuring this fruit: Ar. fr. 698, Theopomp. fr. 68, and Crates fr. 43; to these Pherecr. fr. 158 should be added (mentioned by Athenaeus much later, 14.653e-f, on another occasion). Athenaeus' section concludes with a reference to Theophrastus (HP 3.16.4): ἡ δὲ κόμαρος, ἡ τὸ μιμαίκυλον φέρουσα τὸ ἐδώδιμον (the arbutus tree, which bears the edible arbutus fruit). Galen (12.34) notes that the arbutus fruit is stomach-upsetting (κακοστόμαχος) and headache-inducing (κεφαλαλγής).

fr. 39 (39 K.)

ἀσυμβόλου δείπνου γὰρ ὅστις ὑστερεῖ, τοῦτον ταχέως νόμιζε καὶ τάξιν λιπεῖν

2 καὶ CE: κἂν "forsan" Meineke

Because the one who is late to a dinner party for which no contribution is required, expect him to quickly desert his place in the battle-line as well

Ath. (epit.)1.8c
ἀσυμβόλου —— λιπεῖν, Ἄμφις φησὶν ὁ κωμικός
"Because —— well", the comic poet Amphis says

Metre Iambic trimeter

1. ⏑–⏑– ––⏑|– ⏑–⏑– (hephthemimeral caesura)
2. ––⏑– ⏑–⏑|– ––⏑– (hephthemimeral caesura)

Discussion Meineke 3,318; Bothe 487; Kock 2,248; Edmonds 2,330f.; PCG 2,232; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 306

Citation Context The fragment is cited quite early in Athenaeus' Book 1, without the play-title (as commonly happens in the Epitome; cf. Arnott 2000). At this preliminary stage of Athenaeus' narration various sympotic issues are being successively dealt with (e. g. wine; cf. Amphis fr. 36 "Citation Context"). Since 1.7f the subject of dining uninvited comes up, which leads to a brief discussion on free-loading and on dinners requiring no contribution from the guests (ἀσύμβολα δεῖπνα); it is within this context that Amphis' present fragment becomes relevant and is quoted.

Constitution of Text In line 2 codices C and E preserve the reading καὶ, whereas Meineke (3,318) suggested with explicit caution ("forsan") the alternative reading κἂν. Despite the fact that Meineke adopts the reading καὶ (and not κἂν) in the text he prints, his conjecture has earned universal approval by all editors of Amphis' fragment ever since. Nevertheless, I believe that it is not necessary to alter the manuscript tradition. It is commonplace that verbs signifying expectation (as νόμιζε does in the present fragment) can take the aorist infinitive (λιπεῖν, here), in order to refer to a future event. This syntactic structure suffices to designate an event as expected and/or potential in the future; i. e. the presence of ἂν is entirely unnecessary for this meaning to be complete; see Smyth (1956) §1868. Cf. the comparable case of S. Aj. 1082–1083 ταύτην νόμιζε τὴν πόλιν χρόνῳ ποτὲ / ἐξ οὐρίων δραμοῦσαν ἐς βυθὸν πεσεῖν (believe that that city, though at first it sailed along easily, will in time sink to the bottom), where (for the same reason as the one just mentioned) I consider Elmsley's (1814 ad loc.) reading ποτ' ἂν an unnecessary intervention to the manuscript tradition; Jebb ad loc. also notes that "the change seems needless". Besides, in Amphis' present fragment, not only is (κ)ἂν unnecessary, but καί makes perfect sense and is syntactically most apposite and correct as an adverbial καί, i. e. meaning also, even, on top of that. The adverbial καί typically emphasises the notion set forth in the text that follows, amplifying its notional impact; cf. Smyth (1956): §2881. And this is exactly what happens here; καί underlines the significance of τάξιν λιπεῖν, i. e. "anyone who is late to a free dinner expect him also to desert his line in battle".

Immediately after Amphis' present fragment, Athenaeus quotes a fragment that he attibutes to Chrysippus: ἀσύμβολον κώθωνα μὴ παραλίμπανε. / κώθων δ' οὐ παραλειπτὸς ἀσύμβολος, ἀλλὰ διωκτός (do not neglect the drinking party that requires no contribution. A drinking party that requires no contribution is not to be neglected but sought after). The first line is an iambic trimeter, whereas the second is a dactylic hexameter. Von Arnim (SVF iii.200) acknowledges only the first line as belonging to Chrysippus (xxviii fr. 15), whereas Lloyd-Jones & Parsons register (with doubt) these lines as two distinct fragments by Chrysippus (SH fr. 336 and fr. 337). Porson (Adv. 40) suggests that the first line (the iambic trimeter) belongs to Amphis' present fragment instead, and should accordingly be printed as line 1 (i. e. preceding the current l. 1 ἀσυμβόλου δείπνου … etc.). Meineke (3,318) rejected Porson's conjecture as improbable.

Interpretation What the speaker says must have been triggered by events relating to the play; the obvious assumption is that some invited person(s) is/are late to a dinner requiring no contributions from the guests (ἀσύμβολον, cf. comm. s. v. below). Such a dinner, i. e. provided by and paid for in full by the host, clearly reveals the host's opulence. The speaker is clearly annoyed by the delay. Jacobs (1809: 6) identifies the speaker as a parasite. Instead, I believe that it is either a host or a cook who could be reasonably vexed by a guest's delayed arrival. A host's irritation is justifiable and easily understood, and so is the cook's. During the periods of Middle and New Comedy the professional cook emerges as a stereotypical figure (cf. Amphis fr. 16 "Interpretation"), who is often anxious about the right timing (καιρός) for preparing and serving dishes at the proper temperature (a task that, understandably, requires the cooperation of guests; i. e. being on time); e. g. Dionys.Com. fr. 2 (esp. ll. 7, 35; cf. Papachrysostomou 2008: 171), Alex. fr. 177 (cf. Arnott 1996: 521), Sosip. fr. 1.48–56. Most akin to Amphis' present fragment is Alex. fr. 153 (cf. Arnott 1996: 450), where the speaker (a cook) explains how the guests' punctuality is essential for a successful dinner (cf. comm. s. v. ὑστερεῖ below):

> (ll. 7–13) … ἂν μὲν οὖν τύχῃ > ὁ ταῦτα μέλλων ἐσθίειν τε καὶ κρινεῖν > εἰς καιρὸν ἐλθών, ὠφέλησε τὴν τέχνην· > ἂν δ' ὑστερίζῃ τῆς τεταγμένης ἀκμῆς, > ὥστ' ἢ προοπτήσαντα χλιαίνειν πάλιν, > ἢ μὴ προοπτήσαντα συντελεῖν ταχύ, > ἀπεστέρησε τῆς τέχνης τὴν ἡδονήν
>
> If the person who's going > to consume the food and pass judgment on it > shows up on time, he's made a positive contribution to the profession.
> But if he arrives after the designated moment, > so that the cook has to warm the food up a second time after he roasts it, > or has to finish it quickly because he didn't finish roasting it, > the guest has reduced the pleasure our profession produces

The overall reasoning expressed in this fragment and the association drawn thereby between dining and fighting are quite arresting. The speaker, assuming a self-confident and bragging style (that aligns perfectly with his possible cook identity), claims that being late to dinner is a telling symptom of a specific type of temperament; i. e. a sign of a generally irresponsible and unreliable behaviour. Of course, there is a comic hyperbole in comparing a late arrival to dinner (an inconvenience to both the host and the cook) to deserting one's line in battle (a punishable offense ever since Solon; cf. below s. v. τάξιν λιπεῖν); the former behaviour seems ridiculously insignificant compared to the latter. Yet, the speaker makes this absurd equation, in order to express his frustration at the delay and to explain just how crucial guests' punctuality is to him (and this strengthens the aforementioned hypothesis regarding his identity). It is remarkable that, apart from the preposterous parallelism of these two instances of conduct, we can – looking beyond the comic façade – discern a long-established literary topos, i. e. the parallelism, typically by juxtaposition, of symposion and war, which have always been the major fields of activity of the male population (of aristocratic or, at least, upper class origin). Both the portrayal of this twofold modus vivendi into literature and its manifold elaboration as a literary pattern trace back to Homer; cf. e. g. the feast held by the Achaeans following Hector's and Ajax's dual and truce in Il. 7.313ff.; also Il. 4.257–259 (Agamemnon speaking) Ἰδομενεῦ, περὶ μέν σε τίω Δαναῶν … / ἠμὲν ἐνὶ πτολέμῳ … / ἠδ' ἐν δαίθ' (Idomeneus, beyond all the Danaans … I show honour to you both in war … and at the feast); Il. 12.319–321, etc. See also Archil. frr. 2 and 4 (where wine-drinking and (mercenary-)fighting merge thoroughly to form the identity of the speaker – whether Archilochus himself or a persona). In Comedy this motif is archetypically exemplified in Aristophanes' Acharnians (1085ff.), in the memorable juxtaposition between Dicaeopolis and the warlike general Lamachus. Summoned to the symposion and to battle respectively, the two characters simultaneously gear up, hastily gathering their accoutrements (in a scene where the symposion is also meant to evoke peace, as opposed to the ongoing, real-life war). Mnesim. fr. 7, featuring soldiers dining on swords, reclining on shields, etc., is also a representative example of this trend; see Papachrysostomou (2008) 210–216. Cf. Plaut. Bacch. 69–73.

1a ἀσυμβόλου δείπνου The epithet ἀσύμβολος means without a συμβολή (contribution, share). The noun συμβολή, and normally in plural, συμβολαί, denotes the contribution / share (i. e. of the cost) towards a common meal paid by every participant (cf. Hegesand. fr. 1, FHG iv.419). The epithet ἀσύμβολος is stereotypically used in relation to dining, in order to designate either a dinner (ἀσύμβολον δεῖπνον) where the guests are not expected to pay their share (such a dinner is understandably revealing of its host's wealth, as in the present fragment), or else a person (ἀσύμβολος, used substantively) who partakes in a common dinner without paying, i. e. a parasite (on parasites see Amphis fr. 10 "Interpretation"). Such ἀσύμβολα δεῖπνα and ἀσύμβολοι characters (commonly parasites) feature often in Middle and New Comedy; e. g. Anaxandr. fr. 10 (see Millis 2001: 52–57), Eub. fr. 72, Timocl. fr. 10, Diph. fr. 74, Alex. fr. 259 (see Arnott 1996: 725); cf. Nesselrath (1985) 40, 66. The alternative to ἀσύμβολα δεῖπνα were the δεῖπνα ἀπὸ συμβολῶν (the earliest reference to such an occasion occurs in Ar. Ach. 1211), also known as ἔρανοι (cf. Sud. ε 2893), where the participants paid their fair share of the cost; see Macho frr. 5.44 and 16.315 (with Gow 1965 ad loc.); Arnott (1996) 86–87.

1b ὅστις Meaning comes before syntax here. The relative pronoun, though it syntactically introduces the subordinate relative clause, is placed in third position. Instead, the line begins with the words ἀσυμβόλου δείπνου, for these express the notion (free dinner) that the speaker needs to emphasise. Other examples of such transposition include Alex. fr. 130.3; S. Aj. 474, E. HF 1107, 1349, frr. 31, 36, 269, etc. On the ὅστις-clause see comm. on Amphis fr. 21.1.

1c ὑστερεῖ The verb ὑστερέω,-ῶ here takes the genitive (δείπνου) and means to be late for (for other meanings and other syntactic structures cf. LSJ[9] s. v.). The speaker is irritated by the lack of punctuality on behalf of his invited guest(s); most importantly, he is heavily reminiscent of the cook figure in Alex. fr. 153 (quoted in part in "Interpretation"); the latter uses the synonymous verb ὑστερίζω (l. 10 ἂν δ' ὑστερίζῃ τῆς τεταγμένης ἀκμῆς), as he attempts to demonstrate how crucial the guests' timely arrival is for a cook, who needs to know the serving time in advance, so that he can regulate cooking accordingly and make sure that dishes are served at the right temperature.

2a τοῦτον … νόμιζε The second person singular (or plural) of the present imperative of the verb νομίζω (or δοκέω) is a stereotypical feature of exhortation clauses, which often sound like sententious aphorisms; occasionally, the demonstrative pronoun οὗτος (in accusative singular, τοῦτον) is also present; e. g. S. Aj. 1082–1083 ταύτην νόμιζε τὴν πόλιν χρόνῳ ποτὲ / ἐξ οὐρίων δραμοῦσαν ἐς βυθὸν πεσεῖν (believe that that city, though at first it has sailed along easily, will in time sink to the bottom; cf. "Constitution of Text"), E. Hel. 1657 νόμιζε δ' αὐτὴν σωφρόνως πράσσειν τάδε (you must realize that she acted virtuously in this), Ephipp. fr. 20.4 διδόναι νόμιζ' αὐτὸν σὺ τῆς νυκτὸς λόγον (you can assume he's paying off his debt at night), Alex. fr. 271.3–4 τοῦ βίου τὸν ἥμισυν / ἀπολωλεκέναι νόμιζε (you can assume that he has lost half his life; cf. Arnott 1996: 759–760 with further examples), Herod. 13.3 τοῦτόν τι μέζον τοῦ ἑτέρου δόκει πρήσσειν (that (house) you may consider to be better off than its neighbour; cf. Headlam 1922: 407).

2b καί This is an instance of adverbial καί, meaning even, also, on top of that; cf. "Constitution of Text".

2c τάξιν λιπεῖν The noun τάξις, in military sense, means battle-line, and more precisely, as here, can designate a soldier's place / post in the line of battle. Abandoning, deserting (λείπειν) one's assigned place in battle has always been considered a sign of ignoble and anti-heroic behaviour throughout Greek literature. It is remarkable that already in the early sixth century BC Solon provides against such a behaviour and registers it in his Laws as a distinctive punishable offense (on Solon's sweeping constitutional reform see Stanley 1999, Almeida 2003: 1–69, Blok & Lardinois 2006, Lewis 2006). Solon dedicates a whole paragraph prescribing the dishonouring penalties incurred by a deserter (λιποτάκτης; though not featuring in Solon's text, being a later coinage, the term is compound from λείπω and τάξις). Solon's fragmentarily surviving legislation was published in 1844 by Pappadoukas, and most recently (2015) by Leão & Rhodes. The following fragment is recorded as Article 433 (Book 7, Chapter III, p. 287) in Pappadoukas' edition and as fr. 111 in the edition of Leão & Rhodes (2015: 174): τὸν ἀστράτευτον, καὶ τὸν δειλόν, καὶ τὸν λιπόντα τὴν τάξιν ἀπέχεσθαι ἀγορᾶς, μήτε στεφανοῦσθαι εἰς τὰ ἱερὰ τὰ δημοτελῆ· ἐὰν δέ τις ταῦτα ποιῇ, εἰσιὼν ὅπῃ μὴ χρή, δησάντων αὐτὸν οἱ ἕνδεκα, καὶ εἰσαγόντων αὐτὸν εἰς τὴν Ἡλιαίαν· κατηγορείτω δὲ ὁ βουλόμενος οἷς ἔξεστιν. Ἐὰν δ' ἁλῷ, τιμάτω ἡ Ἡλιαία, ὅ τι χρὴ παθεῖν αὐτὸν ἢ ἀποτεῖσαι. Ἐὰν δ' ἀργυρίου τιμηθῇ, δεδέσθω ἕως ἂν ἐκτείσῃ. The echo of Solon's writings survives in Aeschin. 3.176 and D. 24.105. Cf. Pl. R. 468a and Arist. EN 1129[b]19–21. Apart from this early penalisation by Solon, the explicit obligation to hold one's ground in battle was solemnly stated in the oath sworn by all Athenian citizens, when – as epheboi (e. g. at the age of eighteen) – they underwent an examination (δοκιμασία) and were subsequently enrolled on the register of their deme; cf. Lycurg. In Leocr. 77 οὐδὲ λείψω τὸν παραστάτην ὅπου ἂν στοιχήσω· ἀμυνῶ δὲ … μετὰ ἁπάντων (I will not abandon my comrade wherever I shall be stationed; I will defend … with the help of all); cf. Arist. Ath. 42.

fr. 40 (40 K.)

ἐν Θουρίοις τοὔλαιον, ἐν Γέλᾳ φακοί Ἰκάριος οἶνος, ἰσχάδες Κιμώλιαι

1 τοὔλαιον [1]C, [2]CE: ἰούλ- [1]E: ἔλ- Blaydes "aut saltem γ' (δ') ἔλ-" φακοί CE: φακῆ CE quod Schweighaeuser praefert the oil in Thurii, lentils in Gela, Icarian wine, dried Cimolian figs

Ath. (epit.) 1.30b
θαυμάζεται δὲ καὶ ὁ Ἰκάριος οἶνος, ὡς Ἄμφις· ἐν — Κιμώλιαι.

Icarian wine is also highly regarded, according to Amphis: "the oil — figs".

Ath. (epit.) 2.67b
τοῦ δὲ ἐν Θουρίοις γινομένου ἐλαίου ὡς διαφόρου μνημονεύει Ἄμφις· ἐν — φακῆ.

Amphis notes that the oil produced in Thurii is particularly good: "the oil — Gela".

Metre Iambic trimeter

1. ——⏑— ——⏑|— ⏑—⏑— (hephthemimeral caesura)
2. ——⏑⏑— ⏑|—⏑— ⏑—⏑— (penthemimeral caesura)

Discussion Meineke 3,318; Bothe 487; Kock 2,248; Edmonds 2,330f.; PCG 2,232; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 306f.

Citation Context Within Athenaeus' work Amphis' present fragment is quoted once in full at 1.30b, and once partially at 2.67b (where only line 1 is quoted, slightly modified; cf. "Constitution of Text"). At Ath. 1.30b the context is the same to Amphis' fr. 36 (ap. Ath. 1.30e-f, ubi vide); the point here is to illustrate the wine produced on the island of Icarus. Instead, at Ath. 2.67b the reason for citation is the fragment's reference to the oil produced in the city of Thurii – within an ongoing discussion (begun at 2.66f) on various types of oil (for both anointing oneself and seasoning food). Notably, Amphis' present fragment is the only surviving piece of evidence for both wine from Icarus and oil from Thurii (cf. "Interpretation").

Constitution of Text In line 1 the reading τοὔλαιον is preserved by both codices C and E at 2.67b, whereas at 1.30b only C preserves τοὔλαιον; E preserves the reading ἰούλιον instead. Blaydes (ii.142) suggests that τοὔλαιον should be replaced (at both 1.30b and 2.67b) by the reading ἔλαιον or, at least, by γ' (or δ') ἔλαιον. Clearly, what troubles Blaydes regarding τοὔλαιον is the presence (in crasis) of the neuter definite article τό, since out of the four items mentioned (oil, lentils, wine, and figs), only ἔλαιον takes the definite article. However, we do not need to adopt Blaydes' conjecture. First, the line is correct in all regards (metre, grammar, syntax) and makes good sense as it stands. Secondly, we cannot know what preceded the beginning of this fragment; it is possible that there was something in the text now lost that necessitated the presence of the definite article, only for the oil. Thirdly, it is possible that with time the frequent use of this particular crasis (τοὔλαιον) caused the article and the noun to notionally merge into one inseparable sense, oil, which was used widely and regardless of whether the definite article was actually needed or not; see e.g. Alex. fr. 191.7–9, where the definite article seems equally as redundant as Amphis' present usage: εἶτ' εἰς λοπάδιον ὑποπάσας ἡδύσματα / ἐνθεὶς τὸ τέμαχος, λευκὸν οἶνον ἐπιχέας, / ἐπεσκέδασα τοὔλαιον (then I sprinkle some spices into the casserole-dish, put the slice of fish inside, pour white wine over it, drizzle oil on top). Besides, the fact that the author of the Suda registers τοὔλαιον as an entry requiring interpretation (τ 819 τοὔλαιον· τὸ ἔλαιον) substantiates further the hypothesis regarding the meaning becoming blurred over time (i.e. that τοὔλαιον almost came to be a new word).

Line 1 features another critical issue; at Ath. 1.30b both codices C and E preserve the reading φακοί, whereas at 2.67b they both preserve φακῆ, preferred by Schweighaeuser (Animadv. ad loc.). However, although both readings are metrically equal, notionally they differ in that the term φακοί designates the raw pulse, lentils, whereas φακῆ the prepared dish, the lentil-soup. Despite the fact that this differentiation seems not to have always been strictly observed (cf. LSJ[9] s.v. φακός), here Kassel-Austin are right to choose the most apposite and precise term for the case, which is understandably φακοί. It is common sense that a region (here Gela) would be renowned for producing the raw material (lentils, φακοί), rather than the processed dish (φακῆ).

Interpretation Despite consisting of merely two lines, this fragment exemplifies two interrelated comic topoi / motifs (the first topos/motif encased within a second). First, the fragment features an instance of the popular comic motif of the list / the catalogue; secondly, it constitutes – with all probability – an instance of the stereotypical comic scene where a cook lists his shopping. Regarding the list motif, Amphis uses it again in fr. 9 (ubi vide comm. on ll. 3–4) and in fr. 16 (ubi vide "Interpretation"). The present fragment constitutes an interesting variation of this motif, since the speaker enlists not just foodstuffs, but also the places that are widely renowned for producing the best of each foodstuff that he mentions. There are three more comic fragments that feature similar enumerations of items, i. e. each one matched with the place most famous for producing the best quality of them; Antiph. frr. 191 and 233 (fr. 191 features exclusively fish, while in fr. 233 commodities extend to a cook and some pipe-girls), and Eub. fr. 18 (an assortment of spices).

The second comic topos (prevalent during the Middle and New Comedy periods) consists of a cook (on the cook figure see Amphis fr. 16 "Interpretation") listing the shopping he has just done upon his return from the market, ahead of a forthcoming dinner / symposion; e. g. Alex. frr. 115 and 191, Arched. fr. 3, Sotad. fr. 1; the scene is often expanded with the cook pedantically analysing the cooking procedure for each item (cf. Arnott 1996: 315). Likewise, it is probable that Amphis' present fragment was also part of a longer speech delivered by a cook; being a self-confident connoisseur of best-quality products (and of their respective place of origin), the cook could be currently cataloguing the purchases he has made. The display of erudition, while assuming a conceited style, is a most typical characteristic of the cook figure; cf. e. g. Dionys.Com. fr. 2 (where the cook engages in a forensic analysis of the essence of cookery art), Alex. fr. 153 (esp. l. 14: εἰς τοὺς σοφιστὰς τὸν μάγειρον ἐγγράφω: I'm adding the cook to my list of intellectuals; cf. Arnott 1996: 450, 454), etc.

It is highly conspicuous that in Amphis' present fragment all four items mentioned by the speaker are nowhere else recorded as being distinguished products of each corresponding area. This peculiarity is associated with and may be explained – at least in part – by the strong simultaneous presence of southern Italy in the text; l. 1 features two southern Italian colonies, Thurii and Gela. We know that the fourth century BC saw Athenian drama (tragedy and comedy) transcend the local, Athenian, boundaries and spread throughout the Mediterranean world; mainly westbound, towards Sicily and southern Italy (cf. Bosher 2012), but also elsewhere, e. g. in Alexandria, where Sopater (PCG 1,275–287) spent much of his life (cf. Ath. 4.158d; Sopat. frr. 1, 22, 24; and see RE III A.1 s. v. Sopatros nr. 9; Sommerbrodt 1875: 31–43; Olivieri ^{2}1946: 27–42; Voskos ^{2}2008: 180–189, 310–331, 502–542). Likewise, it is possible that Amphis' unknown play, to which the present fragment belongs, was originally destined to be performed not in Athens but in Magna Graecia instead, where local products (from Thurii, Gela, etc.) would reasonably be more well-known and (for economic reasons) much preferred to the ones produced in the rest of the Greek world. Out of the four items mentioned, most telling is the case of dry figs (ἰσχάδες; cf. comm. s. v.), of which Athens was widely celebrated as the place of production par excellence; accordingly, it would be hard to imagine that a comic character addressing an Athenian audience would praise dry figs originating from somewhere else. Instead, this claim would not sound strange if the speaker was located in any other part of the Greek world. As to the literary record for Comedy in Sicily and southern Italy, this is essentially non-existent for a period of roughly a century and a half between Dinolochus (allegedly Epicharmus' either son or pupil; PCG 1,177–183) and Rhinton of Taras in the late fourth/early third century BC (PCG 1,260–270; cf. Gigante 1971). Yet, despite the absence of literary evidence, the archaeological record from these regions (southern Italy and Sicily) is far more fascinating; I refer to the famous "phlyax-vases" (about two hundred of them), which date ca. between 380 and 340 BC. It is now widely acknowledged that these vases depict scenes from Athenian plays of Old and Middle Comedy, which were either re-performed in Magna Graecia or originally destined to be performed there exclusively. See Webster 1948; Trendall [2]1967; Taplin (1993) esp. 12–20, 30–54, 89–99; Olson (2007) 13–16; Dearden 2012; Green 2012; Taplin 2012.

From a different point of view, the accumulation of all sorts of best-quality products from remote areas (Macedonia, Cycladic islands, South Italy) is reminiscent of Th. 2.38.2, where Pericles takes pride in Athens' ability to have all kinds of goods from all over the world flowing into the city: ἐπεσέρχεται δὲ διὰ μέγεθος τῆς πόλεως ἐκ πάσης γῆς τὰ πάντα, καὶ ξυμβαίνει ἡμῖν μηδὲν οἰκειοτέρᾳ τῇ ἀπολαύσει τὰ αὐτοῦ ἀγαθὰ γιγνόμενα καρποῦσθαι ἢ καὶ τὰ τῶν ἄλλων ἀνθρώπων (and our city is so great that all the products of all the earth flow in upon us, and ours is the happy lot to gather in the good fruits of our own soil with no more home-felt security of enjoyment than we do those of other lands); cf. also [X.] Ath. 2.7 διὰ τὴν ἀρχὴν τῆς θαλάττης πρῶτον μὲν τρόπους εὐωχιῶν ἐξηῦρον ἐπιμισγόμενοι ἄλλῃ ἄλλοις· <ὥστε> ὅ τι ἐν Σικελίᾳ ἡδὺ ἢ ἐν Ἰταλίᾳ ἢ ἐν Κύπρῳ ἢ ἐν Αἰγύπτῳ ἢ ἐν Λυδίᾳ ἢ ἐν τῷ Πόντῳ ἢ ἐν Πελοποννήσῳ ἢ ἄλλοθί που, ταῦτα πάντα εἰς ἓν ἤθροισται διὰ τὴν ἀρχὴν τῆς θαλάττης (by virtue of their naval power, the Athenians have mingled with various peoples and discovered types of luxury. Whatever the delicacy in Sicily, Italy, Cyprus, Egypt, Lydia, Pontus, the Peloponnese, or anywhere else, all these have been brought together into one place by virtue of naval power).

The speaker in Amphis' fragment enumerates the various items in a rather strange and heterogeneous way; in l. 1 he seems to mean "the best oil is produced in Thurii and the best lentils in Gela", whereas in l. 2 he assumes a different syntactical structure, where the place of origin is designated by an adjective defining each corresponding noun (Ἰκάριος for οἶνος, and Κιμώλιαι for ἰσχάδες), instead of using the preposition ἐν in a locative sense with the place's name in the dative (cf. Θουρίοις and Γέλᾳ).

1a Θουρίοις τοὔλαιον The Athenian colony of Thurii (Θούριοι, οἱ) in southern Italy was founded in 444 BC by Pericles, as part of his visionary strategy of creating clerouchies (κληρουχίαι) in remote locations, which were crucial for strengthening and expanding the Athenian commercial network and their sea-power; simultaneously, this political initiative helped relieve the over-populated city of Athens by subtly removing its less desirable members; cf. Plu. Per. 11.5 χιλίους μὲν ἔστειλεν εἰς Χερρόνησον κληρούχους, εἰς δὲ Νάξον πεντακοσίους … ἄλλους δ' εἰς Ἰταλίαν <ἀν>οικιζομένης Συβάρεως, ἣν Θουρίους προσηγόρευσαν (he despatched a thousand settlers to the Chersonesus, and five hundred to Naxos … and others to Italy, when the site of Sybaris was rebuilt, which they named Thurii); cf. also the following paragraph (Per. 11.6) in Plutarch's text.

Amphis' present fragment is the only surviving reference to oil (ἔλαιον) produced in the city of Thurii (for an overview of oil-producing regions see Hehn [8]1911: 108–114); cf. "Citation Context" and "Interpretation". On the crasis τοὔλαιον see "Constitution of Text".

1b ἐν Γέλᾳ φακοί The city of Gela in southern Italy was a Doric colony jointly founded by inhabitants of the island of Rhodes and Crete in 689 BC; see Th. 6.4.3 Γέλαν δὲ Ἀντίφημος ἐκ Ῥόδου καὶ Ἔντιμος ἐκ Κρήτης ἐποίκους ἀγαγόντες κοινῇ ἔκτισαν, ἔτει πέμπτῳ καὶ τεσσαρακοστῷ μετὰ Συρακουσῶν οἴκισιν. καὶ τῇ μὲν πόλει ἀπὸ τοῦ Γέλα ποταμοῦ τοὔνομα ἐγένετο … νόμιμα δὲ Δωρικὰ ἐτέθη αὐτοῖς (in the forty-fifth year after the settlement of Syracuse, Gela was founded by Antiphemus from Rhodes and Entimus from Crete, who together led out the colony. The city got its name from the river Gela … the institutions given to it were Doric); cf. Th. 7.57.9.

Amphis' present fragment is the only surviving reference to lentils (φακοί) produced in the city of Gela (cf. "Interpretation"). Instead, elsewhere in Deipnosophistae (4.158d-e), Athenaeus identifies the city of Alexandria in Egypt as the place par excellence that produces lentils and all sorts of foodstuffs made of lentils (φάκινα βρώματα; e. g. φάκινος ἄρτος: lentil bread, Sopat. fr. 1 quoted ad loc.).

The alternative reading φακῆ, preserved by codices C and E at Ath. 2.67b (cf. "Citation Context"), apart from designating the lentil soup, was the nickname assigned to Hegemon the poet of parodies; see Ath. 1.5b, 9.406e-407a, 15.698c-699a. Φακῆ is also the title of a play by Sopater (PCG 1,284f.); see Papachrysostomou 2012–2013b.

2a Ἰκάριος οἶνος On wine in general see comm. on Amphis fr. 9.3b.

Just like oil from Thurii and lentils from Gela, wine from the island of Icarus (Ἴκαρος, ἡ; cf. Steph. Byz. s. v.) is not recorded anywhere else in our sources as being special or distinguished in any way; yet, this is the reason why Athenaeus quotes this fragment in the first place at 1.30b. Immediately after the quotation of Amphis' fragment, Athenaeus – resorting to Eparchides (FGrH 437 F 1) – claims that Pramnian wine (Πράμνιος; a renowned, red type of wine attested since Homer, e. g. Il. 11.639, Od. 10.235) is produced in Icarus; and that it gets its name from the island's homonymous rock (Πράμνιον πέτραν), according to Semus (FGrH 396 F 6a). Though not explicitly, in this section Athenaeus indirectly identifies the Icarian wine with the Pramnian. However, Jacoby deems Eparchides' testimony fairly problematic, whereas Athenaeus himself proceeds to cite a number of alternative etymological interpretations (1.30e). Indeed, both the etymology and the origin of Pramnian wine were disputed issues; cf. Ephipp. fr. 28 (where Pramnian wine is associated with the island of Lesbos); Phryn.Com. fr. 68; Ar. Eq. 107 (with van Leeuwen 1900: 21), frr. 334.1 and 688. See Gigante (1963) 241 and Ernst Meyer in RE suppl. 14 (1974) 477.

2b ἰσχάδες Κιμώλιαι Dry figs (ἰσχάδες) were commonly included amongst τραγήματα (desserts) served at dinner-parties. The τραγήματα were commonly accompanied by wine (the consumption of which was meant to be incited by the thirst they caused; hence, the reference to both wine and dried figs in this line alludes to typical sympotic procedure). On τραγήματα see Ath. 14.652c and Amphis fr. 9 ("Citation Context" and comm. on l. 3a).

Just like the three previous items, dry figs from the island of Cimolos (Κίμωλος, ἡ) are not recorded anywhere else as a specialty. Instead, it is the dry figs of Athens that were well-known and universally acknowledged as being of the finest quality, to the point that the comic character in Alex. fr. 122 calls them τὸ παράσημον τῶν Ἀθηνῶν (the emblematic/ distinctive product of Athens); cf. Ath. 14.652b (and up to 653b, quoting a number of passages) σφόδρα τῶν ἰσχάδων ἐθαυμάζοντο αἱ Ἀττικαί (dried Attic figs were held in very high regard), Antiph. fr. 177, Phoenicid. fr. 2.2. Apart from Attic dry figs, those from the island of Rhodes are mentioned once, in Hermipp. fr. 63.16, where they are described as giving sweet dreams (ἡδυόνειροι). On Attic figs (dried and fresh alike) see further Arnott (1996) 345–346.

fr. 41 (41 K.)

ἐνῆν ἄρ', ὡς ἔοικε, κἀν οἴνῳ λόγος· ἔνιοι δ' ὕδωρ πίνοντές εἰσ' ἀβέλτεροι

There is, it seems, some sensible reasoning even in wine;
whereas some who drink water are stupid

Ath. (epit.) 2.44a
Ἄμφις ὁ κωμικός πού φησιν· ἐνῆν — ἀβέλτεροι

The comic poet Amphis says somewhere: "There — stupid

Metre Iambic trimeter

1. ⏑–⏑– ⏑–⏑|– ––⏑– (hephthemimeral caesura)
2. ⏑⏑–⏑– ––⏑|– ⏑–⏑– (hephthemimeral caesura)

Discussion Meineke 3,318; Bothe 487; Kock 2,248; Edmonds 2,330f.; PCG 2,232; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 307

Date 345 or 342 BC (so Edmonds 2,331)

Edmonds believes that the fragment's reference to those who drink water (ὕδωρ πίνοντες) is a direct allusion to Demosthenes' reputation as a water-drinker, a quality for which he was mocked by Aeschines and Philocrates. Demosthenes himself testifies to this derision in 6.30 (the Second Philippic was delivered in 344/3 BC) λέγοντας ὡς ἐγὼ μὲν ὕδωρ πίνων εἰκότως δύστροπος καὶ δύσκολός εἰμί τις ἄνθρωπος (the men who told you that I, being a water-drinker, am naturally a disagreeable, cross-grained fellow), and also in 19.46 (the speech On the Embassy was delivered in 343 BC). Edmond's suggestion, though intriguing, is unprovable; see comm. s. v. ὕδωρ πίνοντες.

Citation Context The quotation of this fragment occurs in the Epitome (hence the omission of the play's title; cf. Arnott 2000) and belongs in a lengthy section dedicated to water (ὕδωρ). As soon as the preceding section on wine concludes in 2.40f (cf. "Citation Context" for frr. 36, 37, 40), there immediately begins (by way of antithesis) a discussion of water (its qualities and appellations, comparison with wine, etc.; cf. Amphis fr. 7 comm. s. v. μετάκερας).

Interpretation The speaker champions wine and wine-drinking and, in so doing, argues against a truism, i. e. that wine blurs reasoning and obscures judgement and that the sober ones (ὕδωρ πίνοντες) are allegedly more likely to demonstrate reasonable thinking, acute perception, and sensible behaviour (out of which something positive can occur). This truism, presently rejected by the comic character, is maintained in various passages throughout Greek literature; e. g. in Eub. fr. 133 and Ophel. fr. 4, which are alluded to by Athenaeus 2.43f, immediately before quoting Amphis' present fragment (on wine and its effects see comm. on Amphis fr. 9.3b; also, see Amphis fr. 29 "Interpretation" and s. v. παροινία). The present fragment is heavily reminiscent of Amphis fr. 33 (from the play "The Loving Siblings"; cf. "Interpretation" ad loc.), where the speaker is a fervent partisan of wine. Intriguingly, there is a notional convergence between these two fragments; they both feature (a) the element of reason (cf. the terms νοῦν, φρόνησις, and διαλελογίσθαι in fr. 33, and the terms λόγος and ἀβέλτεροι in fr. 41), and (b) the notion of antithesis between the wine-lovers and the moderate ones. What the speaker says here (as also in fr. 33) must have been triggered by some event / episode related to the play; this event either belonged to the play's prehistory or had just occurred. In either case, this event was brought about by some drunk character. It is likely that the two fragments belong to the same play, and – though unprovable – that even the speaker is the same character and that both fragments were parts of an extended soliloquy of his, where he argued that wine does not debilitate one's capacity to think reasonably, but instead reinforces spontaneity and robustness of mind; as a consequence, daring deeds can be performed (fr. 33.9–10). On the contrary, the non-drinkers, who are used to having only wit in their heads (fr. 33.3), may eventually prove stupid (ἀβέλτεροι).

1 ἐνῆν … κἀν οἴνῳ λόγος ἐνῆν is a gnomic aorist, expressing a general truth. The entire expression "there is reason in wine" constitutes an imaginative variation on the (unattested) proverb ἔνεστιν κἀν κιθάρᾳ τι κακόν (there is evil even in lyre; that is, sorrow lurks even in happiness). The proverb occurs slightly modified, substituting κιθάρα with κίθαρος (a species of flatfish), in Pherecr. fr. 43.4 ἔνεστιν ἐν κιθάρῳ τι κακόν (there is trouble in flatfish), and in Ar. fr. 591.60–63: ἐνῆν τι κἀν κιθά-/ρῳ κακόν. πρὸς τὴν παροιμίαν προ-/φέρεται (there is trouble even in flatfish; it is thus said alluding to the proverb; cf. Kassel 1977: 54–56). κίθαρος was considered sacred to Apollo because of its name, which puns with κιθάρα, Apollo's lyre (cf. Apollodorus FGrH 244 F 109b; ap. Ath. 7.306a). Suda (σ 256) and the ancient scholia on Ar. Av. 82 quote a different proverb featuring a similar structure: καὶ παροιμία· ἔνεστι κἀν μύρμηκι κἀν σέρφῳ χολή (and the proverb: there is bile/wrath even in an ant or a gnat).

2a ὕδωρ πίνοντες Drinking water (whilst abstaining from wine) was typically cast as a taunt against Demosthenes by his opponents (mainly Aeschines and Philocrates), the point being that he was accordingly a peevish fellow with inflexible and spiritless ideas; see "Date" above. Yet, the antithesis between the two mentalities (held by wine lovers and sober people respectively) and the pertinent question as to which one of the two proves most successful when it comes to reasoning effectively and acting wisely constitutes a commonplace controversy that features often in Comedy (and also elsewhere in Greek literature), and extends beyond Demosthenes' personal habits and/or professional techniques. Apart from the analysis of this antithesis in Amphis fr. 33 (cf. "Interpretation" ad loc.), in Aristophanes' Knights we hear slave B wonder (l. 88) πῶς δ' ἂν μεθύων χρηστόν τι βουλεύσαιτ' ἀνήρ; (how could a tipsy person think up a good plan?), which prompts slave A to embark on a eulogy of wine (ll. 90–96); the winning of lawsuits features among wine's prominent benefits (92–93: ὅταν πίνωσιν ἄνθρωποι (sc. οἶνον) / … νικῶσιν δίκας, in a comic reversal of an orator's recommended training / modus operandi; cf. Ar. Eq. 349 with van Leeuwen (1900): 68, the aforementioned (under "Date") passages D. 6.30 and 19.46, Luc. Rh. Pr. 9, Pytheas fr. III.2 Baiter-Sauppe, ap. Ath. 2.44e-f); slave A concludes with a request for some wine, so that he can (l. 96) irrigate his wit and come up with something smart (τὸν νοῦν ἵν' ἄρδω καὶ λέγω τι δεξιόν). Likewise, Cratin. fr. 203 argues against the effectiveness of drinking water: ὕδωρ δὲ πίνων οὐδὲν ἂν τέκοις σοφόν (you will never create anything great by drinking water); the fragment belongs to Cratinus' play Πυτίνη (The Wine-Flask), where Cratinus stood by and archetypically showcased the indebtedness of his poetic inspiration to wine (cf. Bakola 2010: 16–24, 56–63). The contribution of wine to the accomplishment of exciting deeds is also emphasized in Archil. fr. 120 ὡς Διωνύσοι' ἄνακτος καλὸν ἐξάρξαι μέλος / οἶδα διθύραμβον οἴνῳ συγκεραυνωθεὶς φρένας (for I know how to take the lead in the dithyramb, the lovely song of lord Dionysus, when my wits get thunderstruck with wine), Epich. fr. 131 οὐκ ἔστι διθύραμβος, ὅκχ' ὕδωρ πίῃς (there can be no dithyramb when you drink water), and Phryn. Com. fr. 74.2–3 (about the musician Lamprus, PAA 601647) ἄνθρωπος ὢν ὑδατοπότης … / Μουσῶν σκελετός, ἀηδόνων ἠπίαλος, ὕμνος Ἅιδου (a teetotaller … mummifier of the Muses, a nightingales' nightmare, a song of Death).

2b ἀβέλτεροι The adjective ἀβέλτερος means silly, stupid; Aelius Dionysius (α 4) glosses it as ἀνόητος καὶ εὐήθης μετὰ χαυνότητος (silly and simple-minded with a touch of frivolity; cf. Suda α 32). The term occurs cumulatively in Comedy, with its earliest occurrence found in Ar. Nu. 1201; cf. Ar. Th. 290, Ra. 989, Ec. 768; Anaxandr. fr. 12.2 (see Millis 2001: 62–63) and fr. 22 (Millis 2001: 95 considers it to be "presumably colloquial language"); Alex. fr. 247.7 (juxtaposed to ἔμφρων: sensible, prudent); Theoph. fr. 12; Men. Sam. 126, Epit. 450. The usage of ἀβέλτερος is not limited in Comedy; cf. Pl. R. 409c, HpMa. 301d; Arist. Phgn. 811d; D. 9.14, 19.338, 34.41; Hyp. Lyc. 4; Anaximen. Ars Rhet. 4.2; Zeno fr. 313 SVF; Plu. Rom. 28.7; Epictet. Ench. 25.5; Hermog. Id. 2.3; Liban. Or. 11.2, etc. Despite the frequent usage of the adjective ἀβέλτερος by comic playwrights, the noun ἀβελτερία (silliness, fatuity) never occurs in the surviving comic corpus; yet, it does occur elsewhere, e. g. Pl. Tht. 174c, Smp. 198d; Arist. Pol. 1315ᵃ3; D. 19.98; Aeschin. 1.71, etc.

fr. 42 (42 K.)

ὅστις γὰρ ὀμνύοντι μηδὲν πείθεται, αὐτὸς ἐπιορκεῖν ῥᾳδίως ἐπίσταται

2 ἐπίσταται codd.: νομίζεται Meineke Stob. vol. IV (1857) p. lxi

Anyone who mistrusts someone else taking an oath, is an expert in readily violating his own oaths

Stob. 3.27.4 (περὶ ὅρκου / on oath) p. 611 H. (codd. LSMA Br, corp. Par.)
Ἄμφιδος (om. Br, κόνου Ἄμφιδος L, 'ubi κόνου ex vicino μόνον [Alex. fr. 95 in Ecl. 3] ortum putat R. Schoell' Hense)· ὅστις — ἐπίσταται

From Amphis:"Anyone — oaths"

Metre Iambic trimeter

1. ——⏑– ——⏑|– ——⏑– (hephthemimeral caesura)
2. –⏑⏑⏑– –|–⏑– ⏑–⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)

Discussion Meineke 3,319; Bothe 488; Kock 2,248; Edmonds 2,330f.; PCG 2,233; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 307

Citation Context The present fragment is quoted by Stobaeus, within a series of quotations pertaining to oath (περὶ ὅρκου). In this section (Book 3, Chapter 27) Stobaeus compiles a total of fourteen quotations, ranging from comedy (Alex. fr. 95) and tragedy (A. fr. 394, TrGF 3,437) to oratory (Isoc. 7.23) and historiography (Hdt. 6.86). Amphis' fragment is preserved in five codices of Stobaeus (L, S, M, A, and Br), as well as in the Corpus Parisinum Gnomologicum; see Hense (1894) vol. III pp. xxxviii-xxxix, lxvii, and Searby's edition of this corpus (2007); cf. Intro. 3 ("Tradition & Reception"). The following section in Stobaeus' text (3.28) deals with the germane issue of perjury (περὶ ἐπιορκίας) and opens with the quotation of Euripides' famous line (Hipp. 612): ἡ γλῶσσ' ὀμώμοχ', ἡ δὲ φρὴν ἀνώμοτος (my tongue swore, but my mind is not on oath).

Constitution of Text Codex Br leaves out Amphis' name, whereas codex L preserves an initial (and meaningless) κόνου, which R. Schoell (teste Hense 1894 vol. III p. 611) correctly interpreted as having erroneously derived from μόνον, which is the last word of the immediately preceding fragment in Stobaeus' text (Alex. fr. 95). In l. 2 Meineke (1857: lxi) suggested to substitute ἐπίσταται (unanimously preserved by the manuscript tradition) with νομίζεται, but this is unnecessary since ἐπίσταται makes perfect sense, scans correctly, and is grammatically and syntactically flawless.

Interpretation The speaker's tone is neither comic nor humorous. Instead, he expresses a serious opinion on the all-important topic of oaths and swearing. He confidently claims that anyone who mistrusts other people's oaths is the one most likely to violate his own oaths lightheartedly and with little consideration. What the speaker says must be interpreted as a comment triggered by an event directly related to the play (an event either belonging to the play's prehistory or one that has just occurred). It is possible that a comic character (other than the speaker) refused to believe someone else swearing an oath and is now considered capable of committing perjury (if he has not already done so). Amphis' present fragment is one of those cases where syntactic structure interweaves with content; the speaker sets off with a relative ὅστις-clause, which is a typical way of generalising an argument and assigning catholic sanction to a situation presently experienced within the play. As such, the fragment is another example of the fake-philosophising trend, which occurs elsewhere in Amphis' corpus; see Amphis fr. 21 "Interpretation" and comm. s. v. ὅστις; cf. Papachrysostomou (2012–2013a) 167–173.

It is noteworthy that the speaker in Antiph. fr. 237 (which Stobaeus also quotes immediately after Amphis' fragment) expresses an elaborate reasoning, which is heavily reminiscent of, if not quasi-similar to, Amphis' present fragment: δέσποιν', ὅταν τις ὀμνύοντος καταφρονῇ, / ᾧ μὴ σύνοιδε πρότερον ἐπιωρκηκότι, / οὗτος καταφρονεῖν τῶν θεῶν ἐμοὶ δοκεῖ / καὶ πρότερον ὀμόσας αὐτὸς ἐπιωρκηκέναι (my lady, when one despises someone taking an oath, whom he knows he has never forsworn before, this person I believe despises the gods and, even before taking an oath, he has already violated it).

1 ὅστις See comm. on Amphis fr. 21 s. v. ὅστις.

2 ἐπιορκεῖν ῥᾳδίως In our texts, comic and other, perjury is sometimes associated with women (mostly hetairai). Sophocles expresses his disbelief in women in fr. 811 (TrGF 4,546) ὅρκους ἐγὼ γυναικὸς εἰς ὕδωρ γράφω (I write a woman's oaths in water), which is comically paraphrased by Xenarch. fr. 6 ὅρκον δ' ἐγὼ γυναικὸς εἰς οἶνον γράφω (I write a woman's oath in wine); cf. Philonid. fr. 7. The speaker in Diph. fr. 101 despises equally hetairai and public orators: ὅρκος δ' ἑταίρας ταὐτὸ καὶ δημηγόρου· ἑκάτερος αὐτῶν ὀμνύει πρὸς ὃν λαλεῖ (a hetaira's oath is similar to that of a public orator; they both swear to whoever they happen to be chatting with); cf. Epicr. fr. 8 (on a hetaira forswearing being a virgin). Expectedly, perjury also comes up in rhetorical texts or texts of rhetorical nature; e. g. D. 54.39–40, Aeschin. 3.207, Arist. Rh. 1377[a]12, Lib. Decl. 12.2.7, etc.

fr. 43 (43 K.)

πίνουσ' ἑκάστης ἡμέρας δι' ἡμέρας

δι' cod. B: δύ' ACE

they drink every day all day long

Ath. 4.168b-c

οἱ δὲ μὴ οὕτως ἄσωτοι κατὰ τὸν Ἄμφιν 'πίνουσ' — ἡμέρας', διασειόμενοι τοὺς κροτάφους ὑπὸ τοῦ ἀκράτου

As to those who are spendthrift, though not in this way (i. e. contrary to the previous case discussed), according to Amphis "they — long", having their temples pounding because of the unmixed wine

Metre Iambic trimeter

——⏑— —|—⏑— ⏑—⏑— (penthemimeral caesura)

Discussion Meineke 3,319; Kock 2,248; Edmonds 2,330f.; PCG 2,233; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 307

Citation Context The present fragment is quoted by Athenaeus 4.168b, within a long-running discussion on spendthrifts / profligates (ἄσωτοι), instigated by the symposiarch Ulpian earlier on (4.165d): ἀσώτους μὲν γὰρ οἶδα διαβοήτους (for I am aware of spendthrifts who were widely famous). Among the spendthrifts discussed in this section there feature Philip II of Macedon (4.166f sqq.), Demetrius (PAA 312160) the grandson of Demetrius of Phaleron (4.167d sqq.), and Democritus the philosopher (4.168b). Athenaeus reports how Democritus was put to trial by the people of Abdera for having squandered his inheritance (ὡς κατεφθαρκότα τὰ πατρῷα) and how he was acquited when he revealed that the money was wisely spent to sustain himself whilst composing his philosophical treatises. It is against such a productive way of spending one's money that Athenaeus compares by antithesis (μὴ οὕτως) the idle wine-drinkers featuring in Amphis' present fragment.

Constitution of Text The correct reading δι' is preserved by codex B (Laurentianus LX.1; cf. Arnott 2000: 45–46). The preposition δι' (διά) combines with the following genitive singular ἡμέρας to denote uninterrupted duration (cf. Smyth 1956: §1685). On the contrary, the reading δύ' (preserved by Athenaeus' codices A, C and E; cf. Intro. 3 "Tradition & Reception") would need ἡμέρας to be accusative plural, and this would confound both syntax and meaning. Instead, the expression δι' ἡμέρας produces an impeccable syntax and meaning; in addition, it occurs elsewhere, in poetry and prose, with the same sense, i. e. during the entire day/ all day long; e. g. Hermipp. fr. 73.6 οὐ παύσεται δι' ἡμέρας ὁσημέραι τροχάζων (he won't stop running all day and everyday), Th. 7.82 δι' ἡμέρας βάλλοντες πανταχόθεν τοὺς Ἀθηναίους (after they had plied the Athenians all day long from every side), Plu. Sert. 17.8 αὐτούς τε καὶ βοτὰ δι' ἡμέρας ἀναψύχων (refreshing men and beasts all day) etc.

Kock (2,248) suggested that what Athenaeus says immediately after quoting Amphis' fragment (i. e. διασειόμενοι τοὺς κροτάφους ὑπὸ τοῦ ἀκράτου) constitutes a prose paraphrase of what originally was the following (second) line of Amphis' present fragment. Accordingly, Kock turned Athenaeus' words into iambic trimeter (comparing Ar. Nu. 1276 τὸν ἐγκέφαλον ὥσπερ σεσεῖσθαί μοι δοκεῖς) and produced the following line: οἴνῳ τ' ἀκράτῳ τοὺς κροτάφους σεσεισμένοι. Though Kock's suggestion is tempting, it is not necessary to adopt it.

Interpretation The fragment suggests a utopian context. The speaker describes how a group of unidentified individuals (the subject of the verb πίνουσι) enjoy daily drinking-bouts that last all day long. Although what they drink is left unspecified, with all probability this is wine, not so much because of what Athenaeus says next (for he could have embeded the fragmentary quotation in an entirely different context), but because wine is a most sought-after ἀγαθόν (cf. comm. on Amphis fr. 9.3b), whose abundant consumption would be envied – provided, of course, that the subjects are a group of humans. But, whatever the drink is (wine, or else milk or water, in case that the subjects are e. g. livestock), its incessant and abundant provision and consumption are both unreal, utopian. This utopian tone is heavily reminiscent of Amphis fr. 28 (from the play Uranus; cf. "Interpretation" ad loc.). Both fragments can be interpreted as examples of the comic utopia motif, since they both feature the motif's major defining attributes, i. e. unusual abundance and incessant supply of goods (πίνουσ' and χορταζόμενα πᾶσιν ἀγαθοῖς in fr. 28), as well as the sense of uninterrupted duration (εἰς τὴν ἑσπέραν, fr. 28). It is possible that fr. 43 also belongs in Uranus, and that the speaker in both fragments is the same character describing various aspects of the same utopian milieu. It is striking that the two fragments seem not only to fit within the same context, but also to complement each other; fr. 28 features bounteous food supplies and continuous eating (χορταζόμενα), while fr. 43 features ample and unremitting drinking (πίνουσι).

πίνουσ' The present tense stresses further the long and continuous duration of drinking. For the utopian background of the fragment see "Interpretation".

ἑκάστης ἡμέρας δι' ἡμέρας Via this twofold designation of time (genitive of time and the preposition διά with the genitive; cf. Smyth 1956: §§ 1444, 1685), the duration of drinking is strongly marked as being endless (every day and all day long). This endless drinking activity presupposes and simultaneously entails a copious and never-ending provision of the drink; hence, it constitutes a most telling sign that this is a snapshot of a comic utopia scene; cf. "Interpretation". On the expression δι' ἡμέρας see "Constitution of Text".

fr. 44 (44 K.)

οὐκ ἔστι κρεῖττον τοῦ σιωπᾶν οὐδὲ ἕν

οὐδὲ ἕν S: οὐδέν M

There is nothing better than maintaining silence

Stob. 3.33.6 (περὶ σιγῆς / on silence) p. 679 H. (codd. SM)
Ἄμφιδος· οὐκ —— ἕν

From Amphis: "There —— silence"

Metre Iambic trimeter
——⏑– –|–⏑– ——⏑– (penthemimeral caesura)

Discussion Meineke 3,319; Bothe 488; Kock 2,249; Edmonds 2,330f.; PCG 2,233; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 307

Citation Context This fragment is cited by Stobaeus (Book 3, Chapter 33) – unfortunately without the play's title – in a section entitled περὶ σιγῆς (on silence). In this section Stobaeus anthologises seventeen relevant passages, drawing on numerous authors and various literary genres; e. g. Carcin. II fr. 7 (TrGF 1,214), Men. fr. 752, Philonid. II fr. 2, Plu. 90b, etc.

Constitution of Text The fragment is preserved by two codices of Stobaeus, S and M (cf. Intro. 3 "Tradition & Reception"). Codex S preserves the correct reading οὐδὲ ἕν, whereas codex M preserves οὐδέν, which leaves the iambic trimeter line short of one syllable.

Interpretation This single surviving line is an apophthegm on the utmost value of maintaining silence. The comic character delivering this line (possibly within the context of a longer speech / soliloquy) is understandably reacting to some event relating to the plot; either something disastrous has happened due to the disclosure of a secret or some calamity has been averted because someone (the speaker or someone else) kept silent. The praise of silence in such an aphoristic style occurs elsewhere in Greek literature; e. g. Men. fr. 752 οὐθὲν σιωπῆς ἐστι χρησιμώτερον (nothing is more useful than silence), Philonid. II fr. 2 κρεῖττον σιωπᾶν ἐστιν ἢ λαλεῖν μάτην (it is better to keep silent than to speak in vain), S. Aj. 293 (Ajax addessing Tecmessa) γυναιξὶ κόσμον ἡ σιγὴ φέρει (silence brings honour to women), Pi. N. 5.18 (in an instance of shamefulness, keeping silent about the fratricide of Phocus by Telamon and Peleus) τὸ σιγᾶν πολλάκις ἐστὶ σοφώτατον ἀνθρώπῳ νοῆσαι (silence is often the wisest thing for a man to observe; cf. Pfeijffer 1999: 125). See Tziatzi-Papagianni (1994) 155–156.

σιωπᾶν Cf. "Interpretation".

οὐδὲ ἕν A common conclusion for both an iambic trimeter line (e. g. Ar. Pl. 138; Antiph. fr. 85.1; Aristopho fr. 9.5; Alex. frr. 27.3, 115.7) and a trochaic tetrameter catalectic one (e. g. Cratin. fr. 335.2, Anaxil. fr. 22.30).

fr. 45 (46 K.)

οὐχ ὑποστρώσεις ποτὲ τρίκλινον;

Aren't you ever going to lay out the bed-clothes in the three-couch dining-hall?

Ath. (epit.) 2.48a
Ἄμφις· οὐχ — τρίκλινον;

Amphis: "Aren't — dining-hall?"

Metre Iambic trimeter
1.–⏑– ––⏑– 2.⏑–×

Discussion Meineke 3,319; Bothe 487; Kock 2,249; Edmonds 2,330f.; PCG 2,233; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 307

Citation Context The present fragment is quoted in Athenaeus' Epitome (hence, the omission of the play's title is not surprising; cf. Arnott 2000), within a discussion (beginning at 2.47e-f) on the capacity of dining-halls (οἶκοι). Athenaeus explains how the latter were named after the number of couches (κλῖναι) they could accommodate; i. e. the οἶκοι that could accommodate three couches were called τρίκλινοι, those that could accommodate four couches were called τετράκλινοι, seven couches ἑπτάκλινοι, and the οἶκοι that could accommodate nine couches were called ἐννεάκλινοι. Amphis' present fragment features a three-couch dining-hall.

Interpretation The speaker is either a master or a foreman giving an urgent order to a slave or an assistant. The particular syntactic structure (future with οὐ interrogative; cf. s. v. οὐχ ὑποστρώσεις) is revealing of the speaker's growing irritation and anxiety, as the addressee is yet to carry out the particular task (i. e. prepare the dining-hall for a meal). With all probability, this is not the first time that the speaker gives the specific order; instead, now – as the commencement of the dinner approaches fast – he repeats an earlier order in a more compelling and urgent way. Clearly, this line belonged in a wider context featuring intensive preparations ahead of an imminent dinner / symposion. Such a context is heavily reminiscent of the vigorous symposion preparations and the delivery of successive orders featuring in Amphis fr. 27 (from the play Odysseus), where a master, a foreman, and a slave are probably present on stage, coordinating an upcoming dinner party (cf. "Interpretation" ad loc.). Given this interesting convergence of evidence, it is likely – though unprovable – that both fr. 27 and fr. 45 originate from Amphis' play Odysseus and that they belonged in the same extended scene of symposion preparations.

Metre The caesura of l. 1 is definitely not hephthemimeral. It occurred in the now lost initial part of the line; it could have been either penthemimeral or triemimeral.

1 οὐχ ὑποστρώσεις … ; The use of future indicative with οὐ in a question is often used (instead of the imperative mode), in both poetry and prose, in a strong imperative sense combined with an additional connotation of urgency (as here), warning, irony, or self-exhortation (cf. Smyth 1956: §1918); the speaker's exasperation (about what is yet to be done) is explicit in most cases; e. g. A. Th. 250 οὐ σῖγα μηδὲν τῶνδ' ἐρεῖς κατὰ πτόλιν; (will you not keep quiet, instead of talking all about it in public?), S. Aj. 75 οὐ σῖγ' ἀνέξῃ μηδὲ δειλίαν ἀρῇ; (will you not be quiet, and not show yourself a coward?), S. Tr. 1183 οὐ θᾶσσον οἴσεις μηδ' ἀπιστήσεις ἐμοί; (will you not give me your hand at once and not disobey me?), E. Med. 878–879 οὐκ ἀπαλλαχθήσομαι / θυμοῦ; (shall

I not cease from my wrath?), E. Hel. 437–439 οὐκ ἀπαλλάξῃ δόμων / καὶ μὴ πρὸς αὐλείοισιν ἑστηκὼς πύλαις / ὄχλον παρέξεις δεσπόταις; (won't you stay away from the house and stop bothering my master by standing at the courtyard gates?), Pl. Smp. 175a οὐ σκέψῃ, παῖ, … καὶ εἰσάξεις Σωκράτη; (slave, won't you go and see if you can fetch Socrates?), D. 4.44 οὐκ ἐμβησόμεθα; οὐκ ἕξιμεν αὐτοὶ μέρει γέ τινι στρατιωτῶν οἰκείων νῦν, εἰ καὶ μὴ πρότερον; οὐκ ἐπὶ τὴν ἐκείνου πλευσόμεθα; (shall we not man the fleet ourselves? Shall we not take the field with at least a proportion of native troops, even now, if never before? Shall we not sail against his territory?), D. 6.25 οὐ φυλάξεσθ' ὅπως … μὴ πολέμου ζητοῦντες ἀπαλλαγῆναι δεσπότην εὕρητε; (won't you be careful lest, seeking to be rid of war, you find a master?), etc.

The verb ὑποστόρνυμι means spread / lay / strew under, and is typically used with reference to bed-clothes; e. g. Hom. Od. 20.139 ἡ μὲν δέμνι' ἄνωγεν ὑποστορέσαι δμῳῇσιν (she bade the maids spread the bed), Anaxandr. fr. 42.6–7 ὑπεστρῶσθαι / στρώμαθ' ἁλουργῆ (purple bedding was spread), Plu. Rom. 5.2 κλίνην ὑποστορέσας (having spread a couch); occasionally alluding to sexual intercourse, e. g. E. Hel. 59 ἢν μὴ λέκτρ' ὑποστρώσω τινί (provided I do not share my bed with anyone).

2 τρίκλινον The adjective τρίκλινος is used here substantively (the noun to be understood is οἶκος: chamber / hall / room) to designate the dining-hall that could accommodate three couches (κλῖναι). The capacity of dining-halls (and, accordingly, of symposia) varied (cf. "Citation Context"); e. g. Phryn.Com. fr. 69 ἑπτάκλινος οἶκος ἦν καλός, εἶτ' ἐννεάκλινος ἕτερος οἶκος (there was a splendid room with space for seven couches, and another room with space for nine), Antiph. fr. 292 συναγαγὼν τρεῖς ὄντας εἰς τρίκλινον ὑμᾶς (assembling you, being three in a three-couch dining-hall), Anaxandr. fr. 72 τρίκλινον δ' εὐθέως συνήγετο (a room with three couches was quickly assembled), Ath. 5.205d and 5.206a (quoting Callix. FGrH 627 F 1) συμπόσιον ἐννεάκλινον (a nine-couch symposion / dining-hall). On κλίνη as the furniture item sine qua non for a symposion see Boardman 1994; cf. also, from within the same volume (Sympotica 1994), the germane chapters by Vickers and Bergquist.

Aulus Gellius (NA 13.11.1–3) preserves an interesting testimony by Varro (Men. fr. 333) on the ideal number of banqueters for a comme il faut convivial atmosphere: "convivarum numerum incipere oportere a Gratiarum numero et progredi ad Musarum, id est proficisci a tribus et consistere in novem, ut, cum paucissimi convivae sunt, non pauciores sint quam tres, cum plurimi, non plures quam novem" (the number of guests ought to begin with that of the Graces and end with that of the Muses; that is, it should begin with three and stop at nine, so that when the guests are fewest, they should not be less than three, when they are most numerous, not more than nine).

fr. 46 (47 K.)

Schol. (Q) Arat. 37 – 44, p. 90,13 Martin (1974)
Ἄμφις ὁ τῶν κωμω<ι>διῶν ποιητὴς περὶ τῆς μείζονος Ἄρκτου φησὶν ὅτι τὸν Δία ὁμοιωθέντα Ἀρτέμιδι καὶ κυνηγετοῦντα εἰς τὸ ὄρος φθεῖραι αὐτήν. ὕστερον δὲ ἐταζομένην εἰπεῖν μηδένα ἕτερον αἴτιον εἶναι τοῦ συμπτώματος πλὴν Ἄρτεμιν. ἐφ' ᾧ ὀργισθεῖσ<αν τὴν θεὸν> (suppl. e cod. S) ἐκθηριῶσαι αὐτήν. eadem addito Amphidis nomine narrant Schol. German. (AP, SV) p. 58,9 et 113,3. 16 Br., Arat. Lat. p. 181,14 Maass et Hygin. Astr. 2.1 (Robert [2]1963: 50/51,20 – 52/53,7)

Regarding the Great Bear, Amphis, the writer of comedies, says that Zeus, assuming the shape of Artemis, seduced her (i. e. the maiden Helice), as he was questing about in the mountain; and when she was later questioned, that she said that no other was to be held responsible for this mishap but Artemis; and that this infuriated the goddess who turned her into an animal (similar testimonies survive in the corpus of the Scholiast of Germanicus' Latin version of Aratus (AP, SV; p. 58,9, 113,3. 16 Br.), in Aratus Latinus (p. 181,14 Maass), and in Hyginus' Astronomica 2.1; cf. Robert [2]1963: 50/51,20 – 52/53,7.)

Discussion Meineke 3,320; Bothe 488; Kock 2,249; PCG 2,234; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 307f.

Citation Context This is an ancient scholion on Aratus' Phaenomena 37–44, preserved by codex Q (Salmanticensis 233) (Martin 1974: 90,13). In this section Aratus refers to the constellations of the Great Bear (which he calls Ἑλίκη) and the Lesser Bear (Κυνόσουρα); the Scholiast deems it necessary to register Amphis' (different) version on the former constellation myth. Similar information on Amphis' handling of this myth is also preserved by the Scholiast of Germanicus' Latin version of Aratus (AP, SV; p. 58,9 et 113,3. 16 Br.; cf. Gain's 1976 edition of Germanicus' text), in Aratus Latinus (Maass 1898: 181,14 sqq.), as well as in Hyginus' Astronomica 2.1; cf. Robert [2]1963: 50/51,20 – 52/53,7.

Interpretation The evidence quoted above played a crucial role in prompting Meineke (3,320) to suggest the existence of a play by Amphis called Callisto (cf. comm. ad loc.). The maiden who was transformed into the constellation of the Great Bear (called Ἑλίκη by Aratus in the passage to which the scholion refers) was the Arcadian nymph Callisto (Καλλιστώ), daughter of king Lycaon and devotee of Artemis (cf. e. g. Apollod. 3.8.2, Paus. 1.25.1, etc.). The frequent reference to Amphis' treatment of the constellation myth of the Great Bear in our sources (cf. "Citation Context") is conspicuous and points to Amphis' creative imagination regarding the innovative twist that he gave to the traditional story. Yet, a crucial caveat is in order; as I explain in full under Amphis' [Callisto], all these references simply testify to the mere fact that Amphis dealt with this constellation myth somewhere in his work, and not that he wrote an entire play about it (Callisto), as Meineke presumed. Instead, what essentially matters here is to emphasise Amphis' resourcefulness when dealing with the traditional myth. Nesselrath (1990: 234–235) makes a good case regarding Amphis' originality and establishes two major and groundbreaking twists that Amphis introduced to mythical tradition: (i) he presented Zeus assuming the shape of Artemis when seducing Callisto, and (ii) he presented Callisto blaming Artemis, who subsequently punished her devotee by turning her into a bear. Cf. Amphis' [Callisto].

fr. 47 (48 K.)

(a) Exc. e Catasterismis Marc. 33 (Maass 1898: 579) <Π>ερὶ τοῦ Κυνὸς (post p. 251[b]16) περὶ δὲ τῆς ἀνατολῆς αὐτοῦ Ἄμφις ὁ τῶν κωμῳδιῶν ποιητής φησιν, ὅτι ὑπὸ τῶν ἀνθρώπων  (Erat. Catast. Olivieri 1894: p. 39,18 adn.) omissa servavit Arat. Lat. p. 251[a]19 sqq. de ortu autem eius Amphis carminum poeta ait: quum ab hominibus stellas deficere deprecatus, Canis missus est ab eis. et videns Fructus (Ὀπώραν) eo tempore maturescere, concupivit ea et cum hominibus mansit ostendens illis potentiam suam. ob amorem quidem exardescebat et non potens inpetrare magis agrestabatur (ἠγριώθη). homines quidem obsessi ab eo precati sunt deos auxiliatores. tunc Aquilonius mittit filios suos iuniores, qui Fructum tradiderunt Cani. et quod eorum flatu succendebantur ("ὑπερπυροῦντο et ὑπεπραΰνοντο confusum videtur" Maass), mansuefecerunt et sic quidem vocati sunt postulaticii (ἐτησίαι). amoris autem memoria remansit in tempore fructuum fieri apparitio stellarum constante et significante potentiam eius.

On the Dog-Star (after p. 251[b]16) Amphis, the comic playwright, says about his rising that by humans  (Erat. Catast. Olivieri 1894: p. 39,18 adn.); the missing part is preserved in Aratus Latinus (Maass 251[a]19 sqq.): about his rising the playwright Amphis says: when the Dog-Star was invoked by humans to avert the stars from deserting them, he was sent by the stars (to humans). And seeing the crops (personified, i. e. Ὀπώρα) being mature at that time, he fell in love with her and he stayed with the humans demonstrating his power to them. Indeed, he was burning with love and, not being able to get any satisfaction, his passion grew more and more wild. And the humans, being besieged by him, prayed to the gods to help them. Then, Boreas (the North Wind) sent his younger sons, who delivered Opora to the Dog-Star. And, because they soothed the scorching with their breeze and brought serenity again, they were called "postulaticii" (< lat. "postulo" = ask, pray for, i. e. the winds that were granted after prayer; in Greek they are known as ἐτησίαι = the etesian, periodic winds blowing from north-west during summer; cf. Pfeiffer 1949: 80, comm. on Callim. Aet. fr. 75,36 sq.). But the memory of this erotic passion for the crops remained during that season of the year, becoming a service rendered from the stars (i. e. the summer heat ripens the crops), confirming and displaying the Dog-Star's power.

(b) Schol. German. (AP, SV) p. 94,15 et 168,3 Br. (Robert Erat. Catast. [2]1963 p. 168)

Iuppiter … canem … caelo intulit. cuius exortus origine continetur tali, ut Amphis tragoediarum scriptor refert. cum subito hominibus segetes delinquerent, illico missus legatus canis ad Oporam (doloram codd., corr. Meineke). quam ut vidit eo tempore tempestivam esse, adamavit. qui cum flagraret amore nec posset frui, magis asperius urebat. at homines calamitate accepta deos adiutores invocare coeperunt. tunc Aquilo misit filios adulescentes, qui Oporam cani traderent. ipse flatu suo canis ardorem sedavit. qui flatus etesiae dicuntur. amoris autem memoria remansit: eo tempore, quo Opora id est pomatio est, eum oriri ferventissimum.

Zeus brought the Dog-Star to the sky. His rising was so astonishing that Amphis, the poet of tragedies (sic; cf. Robert [2]1963: 20), refers to it. When unexpectedly people experienced a grain shortage, immediately the Dog-Star was sent as an envoy to Opora; and, as soon as he saw her being mature, he fell in love with her. And, although he was burning up, he was not able to satisfy his passion; and so his burning grew more and more vehement. And, after the calamity stroke, the people started praying to the gods to help them. Then Boreas sent his adoloscent sons, who delivered Opora to the Dog-Star; and Boreas himself soothed the Dog-Star's fiery passion with his breeze. These breezes are called ἐτησίαι (periodic winds; cf. the previous quotation). But the memory of this erotic passion remained: at the time when crops (i. e. Opora) are mature, he rises being at his most fervent and impassioned.

Discussion Meineke 3,320f., 1.404; Bothe 488; Kock 2,249f.; PCG 2,234; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 308

Citation Context The two texts cited above, featuring conspicuously bad use and poor knowledge of Latin, refer to aspects of the constellation myth of Sirius (Κύων, the Dog-Star) and attest to the fact that Amphis dealt with this myth somewhere in his work, though they do not specify in which particular play. The first text consists of a lacunose excerpt from the annotations of Marcian of Heraclea on [Eratosthenes'] Catasterismi (Maass 1898: 579), which is complemented by an extensive passage from Aratus Latinus (Maass 251[a]19 sqq.). The second text derives from the ancient scholia on Germanicus' Latin version of Aratus (Robert [2]1963: 168).

Constitution of Text I include this section here simply to emphasise the fact that both Latin texts quoted above abound in various errors (e. g. problematic syntax), which make translation difficult; so, when translating, I practically tightroped in an attempt to remain as faithful to the text as possible and at the same time produce a meaningful English text. Perhaps the most preposterous instance is the term pomatio* (last line of text b), which does not exist; the closer existing terms are the adj. pomarius (fruit-bearing) and the noun pomum (fruit, apple / fruit-bearing tree). Another instance is the erroneous use of the verb succendo (= set on fire), towards the end of text (a); Maass detected the absurdity of the text ("ὑπερπυροῦντο et ὑπεπραΰνοντο confusum videtur":

"overheating" and "soothing" seem to have been confused); succendo signifies exactly the opposite of the notion presently needed in the text; i. e. Boreas' sons did not exacerbate (succendebantur) the Dog-Star's desire, but they soothed it instead (e. g. the verb "placo" or a synonym is needed in the text).

Interpretation These lengthy testimonies confirm one solid piece of information: that Amphis mentioned the constellation myth of the Dog-Star in his work. What these testimonies fail to tell us is in which play this happened and to what extent. Therefore, as I explain in full under Amphis' [Opora] (ubi vide), we cannot unadvisedly assume that Amphis wrote an entire play dedicated to this myth, as Meineke first suggested (3,321: "ac fortasse etiam fabulae, ex qua illa derivata sunt, Oporam titulum fecerat poeta"), when there is not a single reference to such a play anywhere in our sources. Instead, we need to focus on and limit ourselves to the fact that Amphis dealt with this branch of the mythical tradition, a piece of information that agrees with Amphis' pronounced penchant for mythological themes (cf. Intro. 4 "Themes and Motifs").

Fr. 47 resembles the case of fr. 46; both fragments consist of fragmentary testimonies confirming that Amphis dealt in each case with an individual constellation myth (that of the Dog-Star and the Great Bear respectively); in addition, each case prompted Meineke to suggest that there must have been an entire play that accommodated each individual myth, i. e. Opora and Callisto respectively. Both Meineke's suggestions influenced the hermeneutic approach of later scholarship, to the extent that both [Callisto] and [Opora] are now regularly listed among Amphis' proper plays. See Pfeiffer (1922) 111; Wilamowitz (1937) 105.

fr. 48 (49 K.)

Poll. 3.36 (codd. FS, A, C) καὶ δ ι α π α ρ θ έ ν ι α δὲ δ ῶ ρ α τὰ ὑπὲρ τοῦ τὴν παρθενίαν ἀφελέσθαι ὠνόμασεν Ἄμφις (-ίας FSC, ἀγίας A, corr. Jungermann) ὁ κωμικός and Amphis the comic poet called "d i a p a r t h e n i a" (i. e. "deflowering") the gifts offered upon the occasion of taking away a maiden's virginity

Metre Iambic trimeter
⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ –×

Discussion Meineke 1,404; Bothe 488; Kock 2,250; PCG 2,235; Llopis – Gómez – Asensio 308

Citation Context The present fragment is preserved in prose by Pollux, in Book 3 of his Onomasticon, where he goes through multiple terms designating various types of kinship (συγγένεια); within this context, Pollux naturally discusses matters relating to marriage, hence he deems it necessary to cite a term (διαπαρθένια δῶρα), which he knows Amphis was the first to use.

The passage is preserved in four of Pollux' codices: F, S, A, and C. On Pollux' manuscript tradition see Intro. 3 ("Tradition & Reception").

Constitution of Text None of Pollux' codices actually preserves Amphis' name. Codices F, S, and C preserve the reading ἀμφίας, while codex A preserves ἀγίας. It was Jungermann (in his 1706 edition of Onomasticon) that he corrected the reading to Ἄμφις; the following complement ὁ κωμικός (the comic poet) agrees with and confirms Jungermann's insightful correction.

Interpretation The way in which Pollux registers Amphis' usage of the phrase διαπαρθένια δῶρα unambiguously points to the fact that, at least to Pollux' knowledge, Amphis was the first (and possibly the only) one who had used that phrase. The adjective διαπαρθένια derives from the verb διαπαρθενεύω (deflower a maiden; e. g. Hdt. 4.168) and is probably a resourceful coinage of Amphis. Indeed, διαπαρθένια is a hapax term, and so is the entire expression διαπαρθένια δῶρα, which is obviously meant to designate the gifts (δῶρα) that the groom offers to his bride as an exchange for the gift that she offers to him, i. e. her virginity. Intriguingly, although we do know (cf. below) that the groom typically presented his bride with various gifts, these gifts (δῶρα) are nowhere identified as διαπαρθένια. Hence, it is highly probable that the term διαπαρθένια was coined by Amphis as a purely comic description of the gifts, emphasising the sexual / erotic element rather than anything else. The original context of such a phrase within Amphis' (unknown) play remains highly elusive. The general backdrop could be either a rape (featuring New Comedy's repertoire; cf. Amphis fr. 33 "Interpretation") or marriage; sexual intercourse (and a maiden's deflowering) had either already occurred or was about to; in either case a male character thinks of how to make it up to the female character through the offer of gifts, which are comically – and resourcefully – described as deflowering.

The offer of gifts (mostly jewellery and clothes) from the groom to his bride is a stereotypical feature of wedding ritual ever since the Homeric poems and throughout antiquity, and has duly received much scholarly attention. Marital gifts constitute a multifarious issue, which not only pertains to ritual procedure, but also calls for both anthropological and sociological approaches and analyses, wherein lies the quintessential for the Greek thought notion of reciprocity; cf. Gill–Postlethwaite–Seaford (1998) 13–50 (NB the entire volume is of relevance), and Hénaff 2013. From among the vast pool of topical bibliography discussing the notions of gift and exchange in relation to women and beyond see especially Finley (1981) 233–245; Seaford (1994) 30–73; Lyons 2003 and (2012) passim, esp. 22–52; Wagner-Hasel 2013 (and also the entire volume ed. by Satlow 2013); Kirk (2014) 237–241.

fr. 49 (50 K.)

Poll. 2.33 (codd. FS, A, BC) π α ρ α κ ό μ ο υ ς δὲ τοὺς κομῶντας Ἄμφις (om. BC) εἴρηκεν ὁ κωμικός (ἔλεγον οἱ κωμικοί BC) the comic poet Amphis has called "p a r a k o m o u s" those who let their hair grow long

Metre Unknown
⏑⏑⏑–

Discussion Bothe 488; Kock 2,250; PCG 2,235; Llopis / Gómez / Asensio 308

Citation Context This single-word fragment is preserved by Pollux in Book 2 of his Onomasticon, within a discussion (§22 onwards) of various aspects relating to hair. On this occasion Pollux anthologises numerous terms and expressions that he considers to be of relevance. Yet, we cannot say with certainty whether the accusative plural (παρακόμους) was the exact grammatical form originally used by Amphis or whether this is simply how Pollux uses the term within his own prose text.

Constitution of Text The passage is preserved in five Pollux' codices; on Pollux' manuscript tradition see Intro. 3 ("Tradition & Reception"). Codices B and C omit Amphis' name and preserve the vague clause ἔλεγον οἱ κωμικοί. Yet, we do not need to adopt this claim, i. e. that the comic poets in general used this term; instead, this looks like a specious and resourceful way to circumvent the omission of Amphis' name (which was either entirely unavailable, partly damaged / mutilated or otherwise unintelligible to the scribe). Besides, this is the only surviving occurrence of the term.

Interpretation Pollux registers a hapax term singularly used by Amphis, the adjective παράκομος, which he interprets as being synonymous to κομῶν (κομάω: let my hair grow long). Despite the alternative claim by two of Pollux' codices that this term is used by comic poets in general (cf. "Constitution of Text"), this is the only surviving occurrence in our sources and it is likely that was Amphis' own coinage. Regarding the term's precise meaning (LSJ[9] s. v.: with flowing hair), we only have Pollux' interpretation, which may or may not have relied on direct consultation of Amphis' original play. Yet, this seems a reasonable understanding of the term; the preposition παρά presently bears connotations of alteration and change (LSJ[9] s. v. παρά G.iv.3), designating something (here, a habit) that deviates from the standard norm.

The original context into which Amphis used the term παράκομος is beyond recovery. Yet, it is noteworthy that the habit of letting one's hair grow long was regularly practised (i) by Spartans (Hdt. 1.82), and (ii) in Athens especially (though not exclusively) by members (mostly youths) of the upper class of cavalrymen (ἱππεῖς), and was typically regarded as a sign of snobbery and ostentatious display of wealth; at times, it could even bear political connotations of antidemocratic feelings; cf. e. g. Eq. 580 μὴ φθονεῖθ' ἡμῖν κομῶσι μηδ' ἀπεστλεγγισμένοις (don't begrudge us our long hair and our use of luxurious bathing utensils); cf. Eq. 1121, Nu. 545, V. 463–476/7, Av. 911, etc. It is impossible to know whether Amphis used the term παράκομος within any specifically (politically or otherwise) charged context or whether it was simply meant as a derisive comment bearing no further implications whatsoever.

Bibliographical abbreviations

A-B: Austin, C. & Bastianini, G., 2012. Posidippi Pellaei quae supersunt omnia, Milan.

An.Par.: Cramer, J. A., 1839. Anecdota graeca e codd. manuscriptis bibliothecae regiae Parisiensis, 4 vols, Oxford.

Baiter-Sauppe: Baiter, J. G. & Sauppe, H. (edd.), 1839–1850. Oratores Attici, Turici.

Blaydes Adv.: Blaydes, F. H. M., 1890–1896. Adversaria in Comicorum Graecorum Fragmenta, 2 vols, Halle an der Saale.

BNJ: Worthington, I. (ed. in chief), 2007 – . Brill's New Jacoby, Brill Online.

CGF: Kaibel, G. (ed.), 1958. Comicorum Graecorum Fragmenta, Berlin.

CIG: Böckh, A., 1828–1877. Corpus Inscriptionum Graecarum, 4 vols, Berlin.

CPG: Leutsch, E. L. & Schneidewin, F. G., 1839. Corpus Paroemiographorum Graecorum, Göttingen.

CRF[3]: Ribbeck, O., [3]1897–1898. Scaenicae Romanorum Poesis Fragmenta, vol. II: Comicorum Romanorum praeter Plautum et Syri quae feruntur sententias Fragmenta, Leipzig.

DK: Diels, H. & Kranz, W. (edd.), [7]1954. Die Fragmente der Vorsokratiker, 3 vols, Berlin.

Dobree Adv.: Dobree, P. P., 1831–1833 (ed. by J. Scholefield). Adversaria, 2 vols, Cambridge.

FGrH: Jacoby, F. et al., 1923–1999. Die Fragmente der griechischen Historiker, Berlin – Leiden – Boston.

FHG: Müller, K., 1878–1885. Fragmenta Historicorum Graecorum, 5 vols, Paris.

GG: Lentz, A., 1965. Grammatici Graeci, Hildesheim (facsimile reprint of Leipzig edition, 1883–).

IRDF: Millis, B. W. & Olson, S. D., 2012. Inscriptional Records for the Dramatic Festivals in Athens: IG II[2] 2318–2325 and related texts, Leiden.

LIMC: Boardman, J., et al., 1981–2009. Lexicon Iconographicum Mythologiae Classicae, 8 vols (& 2 vols suppl.), Zürich.

LP: Lobel, E. & Page, D. L., 1955. Poetarum Lesbiorum Fragmenta, Oxford.

Meineke Anal.: Meineke, A., 1867. Analecta critica ad Athenaei Deipnosophistas, Leipzig.

Meineke Stob.: Meineke, A., 1855–1856. Ἰωάννου Στοβαίου Ἀνθολόγιον. Ioannis Stobaei Florilegium, 2 vols, Leipzig.

PA: Kirchner, I., 1901. Prosopographia Attica, 2 vols, Berlin.

PAA: Traill, J., 1994–. Persons of Ancient Athens, 21 vols, Toronto.

Page Suppl.: Page, D. L., 1974. Supplementum Lyricis Graecis, Oxford.

PCG: Kassel, R. & Austin, C., 1983– . Poetae Comici Graeci, Berlin & New York.

PMG: West, M. L., 1962. Poetae Melici Graeci, Oxford.

Porson Adv.: Porson, R., [2]1814. Adversaria. Notae et emendationae in poetas graecos, Leipzig.

Porson Misc.: Porson, R., 1815. Tracts and Miscellaneous Criticisms of the late Richard Porson Esq. (ed. Th. Kidd), London.

Schweighaeuser Animadv.: Schweighaeuser, I., 1801–1807. Animadversiones in Athenaei Deipnosophistas (post Isaacum Casaubonum), 9 vols, Argentoratum.

SH: Lloyd-Jones, H. & Parsons, P., 1983. Supplementum Hellenisticum, Berlin & New York.

SVF: Von Arnim, H. F. A., 1903–1924. Stoicorum Veterum Fragmenta, 4 vols, Leipzig.

TrGF: Snell, B., Kannicht, R., Radt, S., 1971–2004. Tragicorum Graecorum Fragmenta, 5 vols, Göttingen.

Val.: Valente, S., 2015. The Antiatticist. Introduction and Critical Edition, Berlin & Boston.

Bibliography

i) Editions of Amphis
(chronological order)

Meineke, A., 1839–1857. Fragmenta Comicorum Graecorum, 5 vols, Berlin: vol. 1,399, 403–406, 423 & vol. 3,301–321.
Bothe, F. H., 1855. Poetarum Comicorum Graecorum Fragmenta, Paris: 480–488.
Kock, T., 1880–1888, Comicorum Atticorum Fragmenta, 3 vols, Leipzig: vol. 2,236–250.
Edmonds, J. M., 1957–1961. The Fragments of Attic Comedy after Meineke, Bergk, and Kock, 3 vols, Leiden: vol. 2,312–333.
Kassel, R., & Austin, C., 1983– . Poetae Comici Graeci, Berlin & New York: vol. 2,213–235. (abbr. as PCG) Llopis, J. S., Gómez, R. M., Asensio, J. P., 2007. Fragmentos de la Comedia Media, Madrid: 292–308.
Papachrysostomou, A., 2008. Six Comic Poets. A Commentary on Selected Fragments of Middle Comedy, Tübingen: 30–100.

ii) General bibliography
(alphabetical order)

Adler, A. (ed.), 1928–1938. Suidae Lexicon, 5 vols, Leipzig.
Akrigg, B., & Tordoff, R., 2013. Slaves and Slavery in Ancient Greek Comic Drama, Cambridge.
Almeida, J. A., 2003. Justice as an Aspect of the Polis Idea in Solon's Political Poems. A Reading of the Fragments in Light of the Researches of New Classical Archaeology (Mnemosyne suppl. 243), Leiden & Boston.
Ameling, W., 1985. "Φάγωμεν καὶ πίωμεν. Griechische Parallelen zu zwei Stellen aus dem Neuen Testament", ZPE 60, 35–43.
Anderson, Graham, 1993. The Second Sophistic: A Cultural Phenomenon in the Roman World, London & New York.
Anderson, Greg, 2003. The Athenian Experiment: Building an Imagined Political Community in Ancient Attica, 508–490 B.C., Ann Arbor.
Arnott, W. G., 1996. Alexis: The Fragments. A Commentary, Cambridge.
Arnott, W. G., 1979–2000. Menander, 3 vols, Cambridge MA & London.
Arnott, W. G., 2000. "Athenaeus and the Epitome: Texts, Manuscripts, and Early Editions", in D. Braund & J. Wilkins (edd.), Athenaeus and His World: Reading Greek Culture in the Roman Empire, Exeter, 41–52.
Atallah, W., 1966. Adonis dans la littérature et l'art grecs, Paris.
Auhagen, U., 2009. Die Hetäre in der griechischen und römischen Komödie, Munich.
Austin, C., 1973. Comicorum Graecorum Fragmenta in Papyris Reperta, Berlin & New York.

Austin, C. & Bastianini, G., 2012. Posidippi Pellaei quae supersunt omnia, Milan. (abbr. as A-B)

Austin, C. & Olson, S. D., 2004. Aristophanes Thesmophoriazusae, Oxford & New York.

Austin, M. M., [2]1994. "Society and Economy", in J. Boardman et al. (edd.), The Cambridge Ancient History, London – Cambridge – New York, Vol. VI: The Fourth Century BC, 527–564.

Austin, M. M., [2]2006. The Hellenistic World from Alexander to the Roman Conquest: A Selection of Ancient Sources in Translation, Cambridge & New York.

Bain, D., 1977. Actors and Audience, Oxford.

Baiter, J. G. & Sauppe, H. (edd.), 1839–1850. Oratores Attici, Turici. (abbr. as Baiter-Sauppe)

Bagordo, A., 2013. Telekleides: Einleitung, Übersetzung, Kommentar, Heidelberg.

Bakola, E., 2010. Cratinus and the Art of Comedy, Oxford.

Baldry, H. C., 1953. "The Idler's Paradise in Attic Comedy", G & R 22, 49–60.

Barker, A., 1984. Greek Musical Writings, 2 vols, Cambridge.

Barker, A., 2004. "Transforming the Nightingale: Aspects of Athenian Musical Discourse in the Late Fifth Century", in P. Murray & P. Wilson (edd.), Music and the Muses: The Culture of "mousikē" in the Classical Athenian City, Oxford, 185–204.

Barrett, W. S., 1978. Euripides Hippolytos (repr. from corr. sheets of the 1964 ed.), Oxford.

Baumann, H., 1993. Greek Wild Flowers and Plant Lore in Ancient Greece (transl. and augm. by W. T. Stearn & E. R. Stearn), London.

Bechtel, F., 1898. Die einstämmigen männlichen Personennamen des Griechischen, die aus Spitznamen hervorgegangen sind, Berlin.

Bechtel, F., 1902. Die attischen Frauennamen, Göttingen.

Bergk, W. T., 1838. Commentationum de Reliquiis Comoediae Atticae Antiquae Libri Duo, Leipzig.

Bergquist, B., 1994. "Sympotic Space: A Functional Aspect of Greek Dining-Rooms", in O. Murray (ed.), Sympotica: A Symposium on the Symposion, Oxford & New York, 37–65.

Bernays, J., 1866. Theophrastos' Schrift über Frömmigkeit, Berlin.

Bers, V., 1984. Greek Poetic Syntax in the Classical Age, New Haven.

Berthiaume, G., 1982. Les rôles du mágeiros (Mnemosyne suppl. 70), Leiden.

Bethe, E., 1900–1937. Pollux Onomasticon, 3 vols, Leipzig.

Bieber, M., [2]1961. History of the Greek and Roman Theater, Princeton.

Björck, G., 1952. "Das Tragikomische und das Wort νεανικός", in ΕΡΜΗΝΕΙΑ: Festschrift, Otto Regenbogen zum 60. Geburtstag am 14. Februar 1951, Heidelberg, 66–70.

Blake, W. E., 1966. Menander's Dyscolus, New York.

Blaydes, F. H. M., 1890–1896. Adversaria in Comicorum Graecorum Fragmenta, 2 vols (vol. I: secundum editionem Meinekianam, 1890; vol. II: secundum editionem Kockianam, 1896), Halle an der Saale. (abbr. as Adv.)

Blok, J. H. & Lardinois, A. P. M. H. (edd.) 2006. Solon of Athens: New Historical and Philological Approaches (Mnemosyne suppl. 272), Leiden.

Blomfield, C. J., 1818. Aeschyli Persae, Cambridge.

Blomqvist, J., 1982. "Human and divine action in Euripides' Hippolytus", Hermes 110, 398–414.

Blümner, H., [2]1912. Technologie und Terminologie der Gewerbe und Künste bei Griechen und Römern, vol. I, Leipzig & Berlin.
Blundell, S., 1995. Women in Ancient Greece, London.
Boardman, J., 1994. "Symposion Furniture", in O. Murray (ed.), Sympotica: A Symposium on the Symposion, Oxford & New York, 122–131.
Boardman, J., 2001. Greek Gems and Fingers Rings: Early Bronze Age to Late Classical, New York.
Boardman, J. et al., [3]1970–2005, The Cambridge Ancient History, 14 vols, London – Cambridge – New York.
Boardman, J., 1981–2009. Lexicon Iconographicum Mythologiae Classicae, 8 vols (& 2 vols suppl.), Zürich. (abbr. as LIMC)
Böckh, A., 1828–1877. Corpus Inscriptionum Graecarum, 4 vols, Berlin. (abbr. as CIG) Böckh, A., 1886. Die Staatshaushaltung der Athener, 3 Aufl. von Max Fränkel, Berlin.
Boisacq, E., [4]1950. Dictionnaire étymologique de la langue grecque, Heidelberg.
Bosher, K. (ed.). 2012. Theater Outside Athens: Drama in Greek Sicily and South Italy, Cambridge.
Böttiger, C. A., 1837–1838. Kleine Schriften archäologischen und antiquarischen Inhalts (gesammelt und hrsg. von J. Sillig), 3 vols, Dresden.
Bowie, A., 2010. "Myth and Ritual in Comedy", in G. W. Dobrov (ed.), Brill's Companion to the Study of Greek Comedy, Leiden & Boston, 143–176.
Bowie, E. L., 1995. "Wine in Old Comedy", in O. Murray & M. Tecusan (edd.), In Vino Veritas, London, 113–125.
Braund, D. & Wilkins, J. (edd.) 2000. Athenaeus and His World: Reading Greek Culture in the Roman Empire, Exeter.
Breitenbach, H., 1908. De genere quodam titulorum comoediae Atticae, Diss. Basel.
Breitenbach, H. et al., 1907. Diogenis Laertiis Vita Platonis, Basel.
Bremmer, J. N., 1984. "Greek Maenadism reconsidered", ZPE 55, 267–286.
Brock, R., & Wirtjes, H., 2000. "Athenaeus on Greek Wine", in D. Braund & J. Wilkins (edd.), Athenaeus and His World: Reading Greek Culture in the Roman Empire, Exeter, 455–465.
Brulé, P., 2003. Women of Ancient Greece (transl. by A. Nevill), Edinburgh.
Bruzzese, L., 2011. Studi su Filemone Comico, Lecce.
Burford, A., [2]1994. "Greek Agriculture in the Classical Period", in J. Boardman et al. (edd.), The Cambridge Ancient History, London – Cambridge – New York, Vol. VI: The Fourth Century BC, 661–677.
Burges, G., 1807. Euripidis Troades, Cambridge.
Cairns, D. (ed.), 2013. Tragedy and Archaic Greek Thought, Swansea.
Campbell, D. A., [2]1982. Greek Lyric Poetry: A Selection of Early Greek Lyric, Elegiac and Iambic Poetry, Bristol.
Cantarella, E. (ed.), 1987. Pandora's Daughters: The Role and Status of Women in Greek and Roman Antiquity, Baltimore.
Carey, C., 1995. "Rape and Adultery in Athenian Law", CQ 45, 407–417.
Carey, C., 2000. "Old Comedy and the Sophists", in F. D. Harvey & J. M. Wilkins (edd.), The Rivals of Aristophanes. Studies in Athenian Old Comedy, London, 419–436.

Cassio, A. C., 2012. "Intimations of Koine in Sicilian Doric: The information provided by the Antiatticist", in O. Tribulato (ed.), Language and Linguistic Contact in Ancient Sicily, Cambridge, 251–264.

Chadwick, J., 1996. Lexicographica Graeca: Contributions to the lexicography of ancient Greek, Oxford.

Charitonides, S., Kahil, L., Ginouvès, R., 1970. Les Mosaïques de la Maison du Ménandre à Mytilène, Berne.

Chroust, A. H., 1957. Socrates, Man and Myth: the two Socratic apologies of Xenophon, London.

Chryssafis, G., 1981. A textual and stylistic commentary on Theocritus' Idyll XXV, Amsterdam.

Cobet, C. G., 1858. Novae lectiones: quibus continentur observationes criticae in scriptores Graecos, 2 vols, Leiden. (reprinted: 2005, Hildesheim & New York)

Cohen, D., 1990. "The Social Context of Adultery at Athens", in P. Cartledge, P. Millett, S. Todd (edd.), Nomos: Essays in Athenian Law, Politics, and Society, Cambridge, 147–165.

Cohen, D., 1991. Law, Sexuality, and Society: The Enforcement of Morals in Classical Athens, Cambridge.

Cohoe, C., 2012. The Human Intellect: Aristotle's Conception of Νοῦς in his "De Anima", Diss. (ProQuest)

Cohoe, C., 2013. "Why the Intellect Cannot Have a Bodily Organ: De Anima 3.4", Phronesis 58 (4), 347–377.

Colvin, S., 1999. Dialect in Aristophanes and The Politics of Language in Ancient Greek Literature, Oxford & New York.

Connor, W. R., 1971. The New Politicians of Fifth-century Athens, Princeton.

Coppola, G., 1927. "Per la storia della commedia greca (Timocles ateniese e Difilo di Sinope)", RFIC 55, 453–467.

Cramer, J. A., 1839. Anecdota graeca e codd. manuscriptis bibliothecae regiae Parisiensis, 4 vols, Oxford. (abbr. as An.Par.)

Crosby, M., 1949. "The Altar of the Twelve Gods in Athens", Hesperia suppl. 8, 82–103.

Crusius, O., 1888. "Coniectanea ad comicorum Graecorum fragmenta", Philologus 46, 606–631.

Csapo, E., 2004. "Politics of the New Music", in P. Murray & P. Wilson (edd.), Music and the Muses: The Culture of "mousikē" in the Classical Athenian City, Oxford, 207–248.

Dalby, A., 1995. Siren Feasts: A History of Food and Gastronomy in Greece, London.

Dalby, A., 2003. Food in the Ancient World: From A to Z, London & New York.

Damon, C., 1997. The Mask of the Parasite: A Pathology of Roman Patronage, Ann Arbor.

D'Angour, A., 2013. "Love's Battlefield: Rethinking Sappho Fragment 31", in E. Sanders, C. Thumiger, C. Carey, N. J. Lowe (edd.), Erôs in Ancient Greece, Oxford, 59–71.

Davidson, J. N., 1993. "Fish, sex and revolution in Athens", CQ 43, 53–66.

Davidson, J. N., 1995. "Opsophagia: Revolutionary Eating at Athens", in J. Wilkins, D. Harvey, M. Dobson (edd.), Food in Antiquity, Exeter, 204–213.

Davidson, J. N., 1997. Courtesans and Fishcakes, London.

Davidson, J. N., 2007. The Greeks and Greek love: A radical reappraisal of homosexuality in ancient Greece, London.

Davies, M., 1981. "Archilochus and Hipponax in a Scholium on Ovid's Ibis", Prometheus 7, 123–124.
Dearden, C., 2012. "Whose line is it anyway? West Greek Comedy in its Context", in K. Bosher (ed.), Theater Outside Athens: Drama in Greek Sicily and South Italy, Cambridge, 272–288.
De Borries, J., 1911. Phrynichi Sophistae Praeparatio Sophistica, Leipzig.
Dedoussi, C., 1961. "The Trochaic Tetrameter in Menander", Πλάτων 13, 59–66.
Denniston, J. D., 1954. The Greek Particles, Oxford.
De Romilly, J., 1992. The Great Sophists in Periclean Athens (transl. by J. Lloyd), Oxford.
Desjardins, R., 2004. Plato and the Good: Illuminating the Darkling Vision, Leiden & Boston.
De Ste Croix, G. E. M., 2004 (edited by D. Harvey & R. Parker). Athenian Democratic Origins: and other essays, Oxford & New York.
De Velsen, A., 1853. Tryphonis Grammatici Alexandrini Fragmenta, Berlin.
Dickey, E., 2007. Ancient Greek Scholarship, Oxford.
Diels, H. & Kranz, W. (edd.), [7]1954. Die Fragmente der Vorsokratiker, 3 vols, Berlin. (abbr. as DK) Dietze, A., 1901. De Philemone comico, Diss., Göttingen.
Diggle, J., 1970. Euripides Phaethon, Cambridge.
Di Marco, M., 1989. Timone di Fliunte: Silloi, Rome.
Dindorf, W., 1827. Athenaeus Deipnosophistae, 3 vols, Leipzig.
Dobree, P. P., 1831–1833 (ed. by J. Scholefield). Adversaria, 2 vols, Cambridge. (abbr. as Adv.)
Dobrov, G. W. 2002. "Μάγειρος Ποιητής: Language and Character in Antiphanes", in A. Willi (ed.), The Language of Greek Comedy, Oxford & New York, 169–190.
Dobrov, G. W., & Urios-Aparisi, E., 1995. "The Maculate Music: Gender, Genre and the Chiron of Pherecrates", in G. W. Dobrov (ed.), Beyond Aristophanes: Transition and Diversity in Greek Comedy, Atlanta, 139–174.
Dodds, E. R., [2]1960. Euripides Bacchae, Oxford.
Dohm, H., 1964. Mageiros: die Rolle des Kochs in der griechisch-römischen Komödie, Munich.
Dorter, K., 1994. Form and Good in Plato's Eleatic Dialogues, California.
Dover, K. J., 1968. Aristophanes Clouds, Oxford.
Dover, K. J., 1972. Aristophanic Comedy, Berkeley.
Dover, K. J., 1974. Greek Popular Morality in the Time of Plato and Aristotle, Oxford.
Dover, K. J., 1978. Greek Homosexuality, London.
Dover, K. J., 1993. Aristophanes Frogs, Oxford.
Drew-Bear, T., 1968. "The Trochaic Tetrameter in Greek Tragedy", AJPh 89.4, 385–405.
Dübner, Fr., 1855. Scholia Graeca in Aristophanem cum Prolegomenis Grammaticorum, Paris.
Dunbar, N., 1995. Aristophanes Birds, Oxford.
Dutta, Sh., 2007. Aristophanic Paratragedy, Diss., Oxford.
Ehrenberg, V., [3]1962. The People of Aristophanes: A Sociology of Old Attic Comedy, New York.

Elmsley, P., 1809. Aristophanis comoedia Acharnenses. In usum studiosae juventutis emendata et illustrata, Oxford.

Elmsley, P., 1814. "Notes on the Ajax of Sophocles", MCr 3: 351–369, and 4: 469–488 (= Cambridge Classical Researches 1826: 1, 351–369, 469–488).

Elmsley, P., 1821. Euripidis Bacchae. In usum studiosae juventutis, Oxford.

Erfurdt, C. G. A., 1812. "Observationes criticae maxime in Athenaei Deipnosophistas", Königsberger Archiv für Philosophie, Theologie, Sprachkunde und Geschichte 1, 424–472.

Fantham, E., 1975. "Sex, Status, and Survival in Hellenistic Athens. A Study of Women in New Comedy", Phoenix 29, 44–74.

Faraone, C. & McClure, L., 2006. Prostitutes and Courtesans in the Ancient World, Madison.

Fehr, B., 1994. "Entertainers at the Symposion: The Akletoi in the Archaic Period", in O. Murray (ed.), Sympotica: A Symposium on the Symposion, Oxford & New York, 185–194.

Fenk, R, 1913. Adversarii Platonis quomodo de indole ac moribus eius iudicaverint, Diss., Ienae.

Ferrari, G., 2002. Figures of Speech: Men and Maidens in Ancient Greece, Chicago.

Fick, A., 1894. Die griechischen Personennamen, Göttingen.

Finley, M. I. (ed. by B. D. Shaw & R. P. Saller) 1981. Economy and Society in Ancient Greece, London.

Fisher, N., 2000. "Symposiasts, Fish-eaters and Flatterers: Social Mobility and Moral Concerns", in D. Harvey & J. Wilkins (edd.), The Rivals of Aristophanes: Studies in Athenian Old Comedy, London, 355–396.

Fisher, N., 2001. Aeschines against Timarchos: Introduction, Translation and Commentary, Oxford.

Foerster, R. & Richtsteig, E. (edd.), 1929. Choricii Gazaei opera, Leipzig.

Furley, W. D., 2009. Menander Epitrepontes (BICS suppl. 106), London.

Gain, D. B. (ed.), 1976. The Aratus ascribed to Germanicus Caesar, London.

Gaiser, K., 1963. Platons ungeschriebene Lehre: Studien zur systematischen und geschichtlichen Begründung der Wissenschaften in der Platonischen Schule, Stuttgart.

Gaiser, K., 1980. "Plato's enigmatic lecture «On the Good»", Phronesis 25, 5–37.

Galinsky, G. K., 1972. The Herakles Theme: The Adaptations of the Hero in Literature from Homer to the Twentieth Century, Oxford.

Gantz, T., 1993. Early Greek Myth: A Guide to Literary and Artistic Sources, Baltimore & London.

Gardiner, E. N., 1910. Greek Athletic Sports and Festivals, London.

Garnsey, P., 1999. Food and Society in Classical Antiquity, Cambridge & New York.

Geissler, P., 1925. Chronologie der altattischen Komödie, Berlin.

Gerber, D. E., 1997. A Companion to the Greek Lyric Poets, Leiden – New York – Köln.

Gigante, M., 1963. "Poesia e critica letteraria nell'Academia antica", in Miscellanea di studi alessandrini in memoria di Augusto Rostagni, Torino, 234–248.

Gigante, M., 1971. Rintone e il teatro in Magna Grecia, Napoli.

Gilbert, B., 2012. Plato's Lost Lecture "On the Good". Normative Ethics and Intellectual History, Diss. (ProQuest)

Gill, C., Postlethwaite, N., Seaford, R. A. S. (edd.) 1998. Reciprocity in Ancient Greece, Oxford & New York.

Gilula, D., 1995a. "Food – An Effective Tool of Amatory Persuasion: A Commentary on Mnesimachus fr. 4 K-A", Athenaeum 83, 143–156.

Gilula, D., 1995b. "Comic Food and Food for Comedy", in J. Wilkins, D. Harvey, M. Dobson (edd.), Food in Antiquity, Exeter, 386–399.

Gilula, D., 2000. "Hermippus and his Catalogue of Goods (fr. 63)", in D. Harvey & J. Wilkins (edd.), The Rivals of Aristophanes: Studies in Athenian Old Comedy, London, 75–90.

Ginestí Rosell, A., 2013. "Próxenos, métoikos, isotelés. La integración de extranjeros en Atenas", Faventia núm extra, suppl. 2, 287–302.

Ginouvès, R., 1962. Balaneutikè; recherches sur le bain dans l'antiquité grecque, Paris.

Giombini, S., 2012. Gorgia epidittico: Commento filosofico all'Encomio di Elena, all'Apologia di Palamede, all'Epitaffio, Passignano sul Trasimeno.

Given, J., 2007. "The Agathon scene in Aristophanes' Thesmophoriazusae", SO 82, 35–51.

Glazebrook, A. M. J., 2001. The Use and Abuse of Hetairai: Female Characterization in Greek Oratory, Diss., New York.

Glazebrook, A. M. J., 2006. "The Bad Girls of Athens: The Image and Function of Hetairai in Judicial Oratory", in C. Faraone & L. McClure (edd.), Prostitutes and Courtesans in the Ancient World, Madison, 125–138.

Glazebrook, A. M. J. & Henry M. (edd.), 2011. Greek Prostitutes in the Ancient Mediterranean, 800 BCE – 200 CE, Madison.

Goldhill, S., & Osborne, R. (edd.), 1999. Performance Culture and Athenian Democracy, Cambridge.

Gomme, A. W., 1945–1981. A Historical Commentary on Thucydides, 5 vols, Oxford.

Gomme, A. W. & Sandbach, F. H., 1973. Menander. A Commentary, Oxford.

Goossens, R., 1942. "Une allusion à Cimon dans le Πολιτικός d'Antiphon", AC 11, 91–92.

Gould, J., 1980. "Law, Custom and Myth: Aspects of the Social Position of Women in Classical Athens", JHS 100, 38–59.

Gould, T., 1963. Platonic Love, London.

Gow, A. S. F., [2]1952. Theocritus. Edited with a Translation and Commentary, 2 vols, Cambridge.

Gow, A. S. F., 1965. Machon. The Fragments, Cambridge.

Green, J. R., 2012. "Comic Vases in South Italy: Continuity and Innovation in the Development of a Figurative Language", in K. Bosher (ed.), Theater Outside Athens: Drama in Greek Sicily and South Italy, Cambridge, 289–342.

Greene, E. (ed.), 1996. Re-Reading Sappho: Reception and Transmission, Berkeley.

Greene, W. C. (ed.), 1938 (reprint 1988). Scholia Platonica: contulerunt atque investigaverunt Fredericus de Forest Allen, Ioannes Burnet, Carolus Pomeroy Parker, Hildesheim.

Gronovius, J., 1697–1702. Thesaurus Graecarum Antiquitatum, 13 vols, Leiden.

Grotius, H., 1623. Dicta Poetarum quae apud Ioannem Stobaeum exstant, Paris.

Gulick, C. B., 1927–1941. Athenaeus. The Deipnosophists, London & New York.

Hall, E., 2006. The Theatrical Cast of Athens. Interactions between Ancient Greek Drama and Society, Oxford.

Halperin, D. M., 1990. "Why is Diotima a Woman? Platonic Erōs and the Figuration of Gender", in D. M. Halperin, J. J. Winkler, F. I. Zeitlin (edd.), Before Sexuality: The Construction of Erotic Experience in the Ancient Greek World, Princeton, 257–308.

Handley, E. W., 1965. The Dyskolos of Menander, London.

Handley, E. W., 1985. "Comedy", in Easterling, P. E. & Knox, B. M. W, The Cambridge History of Classical Literature, vol. I: Greek Literature, Cambridge, 355–425.

Handley, E. W. & Rea, J., 1957. The Telephus of Euripides (BICS suppl. 5), London.

Hansen, M. H., 1983a. "The Athenian 'Politicians', 403–322 B.C.", GRBS 24, 33–55.

Hansen, M. H., 1983b. "Rhetores and Strategoi in Fourth-Century Athens", GRBS 24, 151–180.

Hansen, M. H., 1991. The Athenian Democracy in the Age of Demosthenes: Structure, Principles, and Ideology (transl. by J. A. Crook), Oxford.

Harding, Ph., 1994. "Comedy and Rhetoric", in I. Worthington (ed.), Persuasion: Greek Rhetoric in Action, London & New York, 196–221.

Harris, H. A., 1964. Greek Athletes and Athletics, London.

Hauschild, H., 1933. Die Gestalt der Hetäre in der griechischen Komödie, Diss., Leipzig.

Headlam, W., 1891. On Editing Aeschylus: A Criticism, London.

Headlam, W., 1922. Herodas. The Mimes and Fragments, Cambridge.

Heath, M., 1987. Political Comedy in Aristophanes, Göttingen (Hypomnemata 87).

Hehn, V., [8]1911 (ed. by O. Schrader). Kulturpflanzen und Haustiere in ihren Übergang aus Asien, nach Griechenland und Italien sowie in das übrige Europa; historish-linguistische Skizzen, Berlin.

Helm, R., 1906. Lucian und Menipp, Leipzig & Berlin.

Hénaff, M., 2013. "Ceremonial Gift-Giving: The Lessons of Anthropology from Mauss and Beyond", in M. L. Satlow (ed.), The Gift in Antiquity, Hoboken NJ, 12–24.

Henderson, J., 1987. "Older Women in Attic Old Comedy", TAPA 117, 105–129.

Henderson, J., 1990. "The Dēmos and the Comic Competition", in J. J. Winkler & F. I. Zeitlin (edd.), Nothing to Do with Dionysos?: Athenian Drama in its Social Context, Princeton, 271–313.

Henderson, J., [2]1991. The Maculate Muse: Obscene Language in Attic Comedy, Oxford & New York.

Henderson, J., 2000. "Pherekrates and the Women of Old Comedy", in F. D. Harvey & J. M. Wilkins (edd.), The Rivals of Aristophanes. Studies in Athenian Old Comedy, London, 135–150.

Henrichs, A., 1978. "Greek Maenadism from Olympias to Messalina", HSPh 82, 121–160.

Henrichs, A., 1984. "Male Intruders among the Maenads. The so-called Male Celebrant", in Evjen, H. D. (ed.), Mnemai. Classical Studies in Memory of Karl K. Hulley, California, 69–91.

Henrichs, A., 1987. "Three Approaches to Greek Mythography", in J. Bremmer (ed.), Interpretations of Greek Mythology, London, 242–277.

Henrichs, A., 1994. "Der rasende Gott: zur Psychologie des Dionysos und des Dionysischen in Mythos und Literatur", A & A 40, 31–58.

Henry, A. S., 1983. Honours and Privileges in Athenian Decrees: The Principal Formulae of Athenian Honorary Decrees, Hildesheim & New York.

Henry, M., 1985. Menander's Courtesans and the Greek Comic Tradition, Frankfurt am Main.

Henry, M., 2006. Neaera: Writing a Prostitute's Life, London.

Hense, O. & Wachsmuth, C., 1884–1912. Ioannis Stobaei Anthologium, 5 vols, Berlin (vols I-II ed. by Wachsmuth 1884; vols III-V ed. by Hense 1894–1912).

Hill, S. E., 2011. Eating to Excess: The Meaning of Gluttony and the Fat Body in the Ancient World, Santa Barbara CA.

Hobbs, A., 2000. Plato and the Hero: Courage, Manliness, and the Impersonal Good, Cambridge.

Hoffmann, M., 1999. Griechische Bäder, Munich.

Hordern, J. H., 2002. The Fragments of Timotheus of Miletus, Oxford.

Hubbard, T. K., 1991. The Mask of Comedy: Aristophanes and the Intertextual Parabasis, Ithaca & London.

Huffman, C., 2013. "Alcmaeon", The Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy (summer 2013 ed.), E. N. Zalta (ed.), URL = http://plato.stanford.edu/archives/sum2013/entries/alcmaeon Hunter, R. L., 1979. "The Comic Chorus in the Fourth Century", ZPE 36, 23–38.

Hunter, R. L., 1983. Eubulus: The Fragments, Cambridge.

Hunter, R. L., 1985. The New Comedy of Greece and Rome, Cambridge.

Hunter, V. J., 1994. Policing Athens: Social Control in the Attic Lawsuits, 420–320 B.C., Princeton.

Hutchinson, G. O., 1985. Aeschylus. Septem contra Thebas, Oxford.

Ieranò, G., 2013. "'One who is Fought over by all the Tribes': The Dithyrambic Poet and the City of Athens", in B. Kowalzig & P. Wilson (edd.), Dithyramb in Context, Oxford, 368–386.

Imperio, O., 1998. "La figura dell' intellettuale nella commedia greca", in A. M. Belardinelli, O. Imperio, G. Mastromarco, M. Pellegrino, P. Totaro (edd.). Tessere. Frammenti della Commedia Greca: Studi e Commenti, Bari, 43–130.

Irwin, T., 1995. Plato's Ethics, Oxford.

Jacobs, F., 1809. Additamenta animadversionum in Athenaei Deipnosophistas, in quibus et multa Athenaei et plurima aliorum scriptorum loca tractantur, Ienae.

Jacoby, F. et al., 1923–1999. Die Fragmente der griechischen Historiker, Berlin – Leiden – Boston. (abbr. as FGrH)

Jäkel, S., 1964. Menandri Sententiae, Leipzig.

Jebb, R. C., 1883–1896. Sophocles: The Plays and Fragments, with critical notes, commentary and translation in English prose, 7 vols, Cambridge.

Jensen, Ch. (ed.), 1917. Hyperidis Orationes sex cum ceterarum fragmentis, Leipzig.

Jungermann, G. (ed.), 1706. Ἰουλίου Πολυδεύκους Ὀνομαστικὸν ἐν βιβλίοις δέκα, 2 vols, Amsterdam.

Kaibel, G. (ed.), 1958. Comicorum Graecorum Fragmenta, Berlin. (abbr. as CGF)

Kann, S., 1909. De iteratis apud poetas antiquae et mediae comoediae atticae, Diss., Giessen.

Kassel, R., 1954. Quomodo quibus locis apud veteres scriptores graecos infantes atque parvuli pueri inducantur describantur commemorentur, Meisenheim am Glan.

Kassel, R., 1973. "Zum Euripideischen Kyklops", Maia 25, 99–106.

Kassel, R., 1977. "Aus der Arbeit an den Poetae Comici Graeci", ZPE 25, 54–94.
Kennedy, G. A., 1963. The Art of Persuasion in Greece, London.
Kenzler, U., 1999. Studien zur Entwicklung und Struktur der griechischen Agora in archaischer und klassischer Zeit, Frankfurt.
Keuls, E. C., 1985. The Reign of the Phallus: Sexual Politics in Ancient Athens, New York.
Kidd, S. E., 2014. Nonsense and Meaning in Ancient Greek Comedy, Cambridge & New York.
Killebrew, A., 1997. "Baths", in E. M. Meyers (ed.), The Oxford Encyclopedia of Archaeology in the Near East, I 283–285.
Kindstrand, J. F., 1976. Bion of Borysthenes, Uppsala.
Kirchner, I., 1901. Prosopographia Attica, 2 vols, Berlin. (abbr. as PA)
Kirk, O., 2014. The Hesiodic Catalogue of Women and Archaic Greece, New York.
Kivilo, M., 2010. Early Greek Poets' Lives: The Shaping of the Tradition (Mnemosyne suppl. 322), Leiden.
Kleingünther, A., 1933. "Πρῶτος εὑρετής. Untersuchungen zur Geschichte einer Fragestellung", Philologus suppl. 26.1, 1–155.
Knox, P. E., 1995. Ovid. Heroides: Select Epistles, Cambridge & New York.
Kokolakis, M., 1960. The Dramatic Simile of Life, Athens.
Konstan, D., 1987. "Between Courtesan and Wife: Menander's Perikeiromene", Phoenix 41, 122–139.
Konstan, D., 1994. "Premarital Sex, Illegitimacy, and Male Anxiety in Menander and Athens" in A. L. Boegehold & A. C. Scafuro (edd.), Athenian Identity and Civic Ideology, Baltimore, 217–235.
Konstan, D., 2013. "Menander's Slaves: The Banality of Violence", in B. Akrigg & R. Tordoff (edd.), Slaves and Slavery in Ancient Greek Comic Drama, Cambridge, 144–158.
Konstantakos, I. M., 2000a. A Commentary on the Fragments of Eight Plays of Antiphanes, Diss., Cambridge.
Konstantakos, I. M., 2000b. "Notes on the Chronology and Career of Antiphanes", Eikasmos 11, 173–196.
Konstantakos, I. M., 2014. "Comedy in the Fourth Century I: Mythological Burlesques", in M. Fontaine & A. C. Scafuro, The Oxford Handbook of Greek and Roman Comedy, Oxford & New York, 160–180.
Kosmetatou, E., 2003. "The Attalids of Pergamon", in A. Erskine (ed.), A Companion to the Hellenistic World, Malden MA, 159–174.
Koster, S., 1980. Die Invektive in der griechischen und römischen Literatur, Hain.
Kowalzig, B. & Wilson, P. (edd.). 2013. Dithyramb in Context, Oxford.
Kretschmer, P., 1894. Die griechischen Vaseninschriften ihrer Sprache nach Untersucht, Gütersloh.
Krieter-Spiro, M., 1997. Sklaven, Köche und Hetären: das Dienstpersonal bei Menander: Stellung, Rolle, Komik und Sprache, Stuttgart.
Kühner, R. & Blass, F., [3]1890–1904. Ausführliche Grammatik der griechischen Sprache. Erster Teil: Elementar- und Formenlehre, 2 vols, Hannover.
Kühner, R. & Gerth, B., [4]1955. Ausführliche Grammatik der griechischen Sprache, 2 vols, Leverkusen.

Kurke, L., 1997. "Inventing the 'Hetaira': Sex, Politics, and Discursive Conflict in Archaic Greece", ClAnt 16.1, 106–150.

Kurke, L., 1997. 1999a. Coins, Bodies, Games, and Gold: The Politics of Meaning in Archaic Greece, Princeton.

Kurke, L., 1997. 1999b. "Ancient Greek Board Games and How to Play Them", ClPh 94, 247–267.

Kuses, E. T., 1890. "Διορθώσεις ἀποσπασμάτων τινων τῶν κωμικῶν ποιητῶν", Ἀθηνᾶ 2, 329–341.

Kyle, D., 1987. Athletics in ancient Athens, Leiden.

Kyle, D., 2007. Sport and Spectacle in the Ancient World, Malden.

Lambin, G., 1984. "Mots familiers en νανν(ν)α- / νανν(ν)ι- / νανν(ν)-ο- , νενι- / νε(ν)-ο- , νιν(ν)ι- et νυννι-", Rev. Phil. 58, 83–91.

Lape, S., 2004. Reproducing Athens: Menander's Comedy, Democratic Culture, and the Hellenistic City, Princeton.

Lausberg, H., 1998. Handbook of Literary Rhetoric: A Foundation for Literary Study (transl. by M. T. Bliss), Leiden & Boston.

Lautensach, O., 1899. Grammatische Studien zu den griechischen Tragikern und Komikern. Augment und Reduplikation, Hanover & Leipzig.

Leão, D. F. & Rhodes, P. J., 2015. The Laws of Solon: a new edition with introduction, translation and commentary, London.

Lefkowitz, M. R., [2]2012. The Lives of the Greek Poets, Baltimore.

Lefkowitz, M. R. & Fant, M. B. (edd.), [3]2005. Women's Life in Greece and Rome: A Source Book in Translation, Baltimore.

Lehrs, K., [2]1875. Populäre Aufsätze aus dem alterthum vorzugsweise zur Ethik und Religion der Griechen, Leipzig.

Lentz, A., 1965. Grammatici Graeci, Hildesheim (facsimile reprint of Leipzig edition, 1883–). (abbr. as GG)

Leutsch, E. L. & Schneidewin, F. G., 1839. Corpus Paroemiographorum Graecorum, Göttingen. (abbr. as CPG)

Lewis, J., 2006. Solon the Thinker, London.

Lewis, S., 2002. The Athenian Woman: An Iconographic Handbook, London.

Liapes, V., 2002. Μενάνδρου Γνῶμαι Μονόστιχοι, Athens.

Lilja, S., 1972. The Treatment of Odours in the Poetry of Antiquity, Helsinki.

Lloyd-Jones, H., 1965. "λίθος πολίτης", CR 15, 246–247.

Lloyd-Jones, H. & Parsons, P., 1983. Supplementum Hellenisticum, Berlin & New York. (abbr. as SH)

Lobeck, C. A., 1837. Paralipomena Grammaticae Graecae, Leipzig.

Lobel, E. & Page, D. L., 1955. Poetarum Lesbiorum Fragmenta, Oxford. (abbr. as LP)

Locker, E., 1933. "Die Bildung der griechischen Kurz- und Kosenamen", Glotta 22, 46–100.

Lodge, R. C., [2]2000. Plato's Theory of Ethics: The Moral Criterion and The Highest Good, London.

Longrigg, J., 1993. Greek Rational Medicine: Philosophy and Medicine from Alcmaeon to the Alexandrians, London.

Longrigg, J., 1998. Greek Medicine: From the Heroic to the Hellenistic Age, London.

Loomis, W. T., 1998. Wages, Welfare Costs, and Inflation in Classical Athens, Ann Arbor.
López Eire, A., 1996. La lengua coloquial de la comedia aristofánica, Murcia.
Lorber, F., 1979. Inschriften auf korinthischen Vasen: archäologisch-epigraphische Untersuchungen zur korinthischen Vasenmalerei im 7. und 6. Jh. v. Chr., Berlin.
Lorenzoni, A., 1984. "Pesci ἀληθινοί", Giornale Filologico Ferrarese 7, 19–23.
Lucore, S. K. & Trümper, M., 2013. Greek Baths and Bathing Culture: New Discoveries and Approaches, Leuven & Walpole.
Lukinowich, A., 1994. "The Play of Reflections between Literary Form and the Sympotic Theme in the Deipnosophistae of Athenaeus", in O. Murray (ed.), Sympotica: A Symposium on the Symposion, Oxford & New York, 263–271.
Lyons, D. J., 2003. "Dangerous Gifts: Ideologies of Marriage and Exchange in Ancient Greece", ClAnt 22.1, 93–134.
Lyons, D. J., 2012. Dangerous Gifts: Gender and Exchange in Ancient Greece, Austin.
Lytle, E., 2010. "Fish Lists in the Wilderness: The Social and Economic History of a Boiotian Price Decree", Hesperia 79, 253–303.
Maas, P., 1958. Textual Criticism (transl. by B. Flower), Oxford.
Maass, E., 1898. Commentariorum in Aratum Reliquiae, Berlin.
MacCary, W. Th., 1969. "Menander's Slaves: their Names, Roles, and Masks", TAPA 100, 277–294.
MacDowell, D. M., 1971. Aristophanes Wasps, Oxford.
MacDowell, D. M., 1993. "The case of the Rude Soldier (Lysias 9)", in Symposion 1993: Vorträge zur griechischen und hellenistischen Rechtsgeschichte (Graz-Andritz, 12.-16. September 1993), hrsg. von Gerhard Thür, 153–164.
Maidment, K. J., 1935. "The Later Comic Chorus", CQ 29, 1–24.
Männlein, I., 2000. "What can go wrong at a dinner-party: the unmasking of false philosophers in Lucian's Symposium or The Lapiths" in K. Pollmann (ed.), Double standards in the ancient and medieval world, Göttingen, 247–262.
Manuwald, G., 2014. "Tragedy, Paratragedy, and Roman Comedy", in M. Fontaine & A. C. Scafuro, The Oxford Handbook of Greek and Roman Comedy, Oxford & New York, 580–598.
Marcovich, M., 1999–2002. Diogenes Laertius Vitae Philosophorum, 3 vols, Stuttgart.
Marek, C., 1984. Die Proxenie, Frankfurt am Main & New York.
Marshall, P. K. (ed.), 1993. Hyginus. Fabulae, Stuttgart & Leipzig.
Martin, J., 1974. Scholia in Aratum vetera, Stuttgart.
Marx, F., 1904–1905. C. Lucilii Carminum reliquiae, 2 vols, Leipzig.
Marx, F., 1928. Plautus Rudens: Text und Kommentar, Leipzig.
Mastronarde, D. J., 2005. "The Gods", in J. Gregory (ed.), A Companion to Greek Tragedy, Malden & Oxford, 321–332.
Mastronarde, D. J., 2010. The Art of Euripides: Dramatic Technique and Social Context, Cambridge.
McClure, L. K., 2003. Courtesans at Table. Gender and Greek Literary Culture in Athenaeus, New York & London.
McGovern, P. E., 2007. Ancient Wine: The Search for the Origins of Viniculture, Princeton & Oxford.

McKechnie, P. & Guillaume, P. (edd.), 2008. Ptolemy II Philadelphus and his World, Leiden & Boston.

Meineke, A., 1823. Menandri et Philemonis Reliquiae, Berlin.

Meineke, A., 1855–1856. Ἰωάννου Στοβαίου Ἀνθολόγιον. Ioannis Stobaei Florilegium, 2 vols, Leipzig. (abbr. as Stob.)

Meineke, A., 1867. Analecta critica ad Athenaei Deipnosophistas, Leipzig. (abbr. as Anal.)

Mejer, J., 1978. Diogenes Laertius and his Hellenistic Background (Hermes Einzelschr. H. 40), Wiesbaden.

Metzger, H., 1951. Les Représentations dans la Céramique Attique du IVe siècle, Paris.

Millis, B. W., 2001. A Commentary on the Fragments of Anaxandrides, Diss., Illinois.

Millis, B. W. & Olson, S. D., 2012. Inscriptional Records for the Dramatic Festivals in Athens: IG II² 2318–2325 and related texts, Leiden. (abbr. as IRDF)

Miner, J., 2003. "Courtesan, Concubine, Whore: Apollodorus' deliberate use of terms for prostitutes", AJPh 124.1, 19–37.

Mitteis, L. & Wilcken, U., 1912. Grundzüge und Chrestomathie der Papyruskunde, 2 vols, Leipzig & Berlin.

Monoson, S. S., 2000. Plato's Democratic Entanglements: Athenian Politics and the Practice of Philosophy, Princeton.

Moorhouse, A. C., 1962. "Εὖ οἶδα and οὐδὲ εἷς: Cases of Hiatus", CQ 12 (n.s.), 239–247.

Mossé, C., 1973. Athens in Decline, 404–86 B.C. (transl. by J. Stewart), London & Boston.

Most, G. W., 1996. "Reflecting Sappho", in E. Greene (ed.), Re-Reading Sappho: Reception and Transmission, Berkeley, 11–35.

Müller, K., 1878–1885. Fragmenta Historicorum Graecorum, 5 vols, Paris. (abbr. as FHG)

Murray, O., 1991. "War and the Symposium", in J. Slater (ed.), Dining in a Classical Context, Ann Arbor, 83–103.

Murray, O., 1994a. "Sympotic History", in O. Murray (ed.), Sympotica: A Symposium on the Symposion, Oxford & New York, 3–13.

Murray, O., 1994b. "The Affair of the Mysteries: Democracy and the Drinking Group", in O. Murray (ed.), Sympotica: A Symposium on the Symposion, Oxford & New York, 149–161.

Murray, O. & Tecusan, M. (edd.), 1995. In Vino Veritas, London.

Musurillo, H., 1967. The Light and the Darkness, Leiden.

Nagy, G., 1990. Greek Mythology and Poetics, Ithaca.

Neil, R. A., 1901. The Knights of Aristophanes, Cambridge.

Nervegna, S., 2007. "Staging Scenes or Plays? Theatrical Revivals of 'Old' Greek Drama in Antiquity", ZPE 162, 14–42.

Nesselrath, H.-G., 1985. Lukians Parasitendialog: Untersuchungen und Kommentar, Berlin & New York.

Nesselrath, H.-G., 1990. Die attische Mittlere Komödie, Berlin & New York.

Nesselrath, H.-G., 1995. "Myth, Parody, and Comic Plots: The Birth of Gods and Middle Comedy", in G. W. Dobrov (ed.), Beyond Aristophanes: Transition and Diversity in Greek Comedy, Atlanta, 1–28.

Nesselrath, H.-G., 2006. "Amphis", in Brill's New Pauly. Antiquity volumes edited by H. Cancik & H. Schneider. Brill Online.

Newiger, H.-J., 1957. Metapher und Allegorie: Studien zu Aristophanes, Stuttgart.

Nightingale, A. W., 1995. Genres in dialogue: Plato and the construct of philosophy, Cambridge & New York.

North, H., 1966. Sophrosyne. Self-Knowledge and Self-Restraint in Greek Literature, Ithaca NY.

Noussia, M., 2001. "Solon's Symposium (Frs. 32–4 and 36 Gentili – Prato[2] = 38–40 and 41 West)", CQ 51, 353–359.

Oakley, J. H. & Sinos, R. H., 1993. The Wedding in Ancient Athens, Madison.

Oellacher, H., 1916. "Zur Chronologie der altattischen Komödie", WS 38, 81–157.

Olivieri, A. (ed.), 1897. Pseudo-Eratosthenis Catasterismi, Leipzig.

Olivieri, A., [2]1946. Frammenti della commedia greca e del mimo nella Sicilia e nella magna Grecia; testo e commento, Napoli.

Olson, S. D., 1998. Aristophanes Peace, Oxford.

Olson, S. D., 2002. Aristophanes Acharnians, Oxford.

Olson, S. D., 2006–2012. Athenaeus. The Learned Banqueters, 8 vols, Cambridge MA.

Olson, S. D., 2007. Broken Laughter: Select Fragments of Greek Comedy, Oxford.

Olson, S. D. & Sens, A., 1999. Matro of Pitane and the Tradition of Epic Parody in the Fourth Century BCE: Text, Translation, and Commentary, Atlanta.

Olson, S. D. & Sens, A., 2000. Archestratos of Gela: Greek Culture and Cuisine in the Fourth Century BCE: Text, Translation, and Commentary, Oxford & New York.

Orth, C., 2009. Strattis: Die Fragmente. Ein Kommentar, Berlin.

Orth, C., 2013. Alkaios – Apollophanes: Einleitung, Übersetzung, Kommentar, Heidelberg.

Orth, C., 2014. Aristomenes – Metagenes: Einleitung, Übersetzung, Kommentar, Heidelberg.

Orth, C., 2015. Nikochares – Xenophon: Einleitung, Übersetzung, Kommentar, Heidelberg.

Osborne, R., 1987. Classical Landscape with Figures: The Ancient Greek City and its Countryside, London.

Osborne, R., 2001. "The use of abuse: Semonides 7", PCPhS 47, 47–64.

Osborne, R., 2007. "Projecting Identities in the Greek Symposion", in J. Sofaer (ed.), Material Identities, Malden MA, 31–52.

Osborne, R., 2014. "Intoxication and Sociality: The Symposium in the Ancient Greek World", Past & Present 222 (suppl. 9), 34–60.

Padel, R., [2]1993. "Women: Model for Possession by Greek Daemons", in A. Cameron & A. Kuhrt, Images of Women in Antiquity, London, 3–19.

Page, D. L., 1974. Supplementum Lyricis Graecis, Oxford. (abbr. as Suppl.)

Page, D. L., 1981. Further Greek Epigrams: Epigrams before A.D. 50 from the Greek Anthology and other sources, not included in Hellenistic Epigrams or The Garland of Philip, Cambridge.

Panayotakis, C., 2010. Decimus Laberius: The Fragments, Cambridge & New York.

Papachrysostomou, A., 2009. "Οὐδὲν πρὸς τὴν πόλιν; Αναφορές σε πολιτικά πρόσωπα στη Μέση Κωμωδία του τετάρτου αιώνα π.Χ.", Hellenika 59.2, 181–204.

Papachrysostomou, A., 2012–2013a. "Continuity and Change in the Comic Genre or How it all ended up with Menander: The Case of Sub-Trends", Ordia Prima 11–12, 165–189.

Papachrysostomou, A., 2012–2013b. "Sopater's Φακῆ (fragments 18, 19): A Play of Self-Satire (?)", Classics Ireland 19–20, 53–85.

Papachrysostomou, A., (forthcoming). "Time- and Space-Travelling in Greek Middle Comedy", in M. Christopoulos, A. Papachrysostomou, A. Bierl (edd.), Time and Space in Ancient Myth and Religion, Berlin.

Papageorgiou, N., 2000. A Study in the Aristophanic Agon. Clouds, Wasps and Plutus, Diss., London.

Pappadoukas, N., 1844. Ὁ Σόλων, Ἀρχαῖον Ἑλληνικὸν Δίκαιον, Hermopolis – Syros.

Parker, L. P. E., 1997. The Songs of Aristophanes, Oxford.

Parker, R., 1983. Miasma. Pollution and Purification in early Greek Religion, Oxford.

Paulas, J., 2010. "The Bazaar Fish Market in Fourth-Century Greek Comedy", Arethusa 43, 403–428.

Pearson, A. C., 1917. The Fragments of Sophocles, 3 vols, Cambridge.

Peek, W. (ed.), 1955. Griechische Vers-Inschriften I, Berlin.

Pellegrino, M., 2013. Nicofonte: Introduzione, Traduzione e Commento, Mainz.

Pembroke, S., 1967. "Women in Charge. The Function of Alternatives in early Greek Tradition and the ancient idea of Matriarchy", JWI 30, 1–35.

Pfeiffer, R., 1922. Kallimachosstudien; Untersuchungen zur Arsinoe und zu den Aitia des Kallimachos, Munich.

Pfeiffer, R., 1949–1953. Callimachus, 2 vols, Oxford.

Pfeijffer, I. L., 1999. Three Aeginetan Odes of Pindar: A Commentary on Nemean V, Nemean III, and Pythian VIII (Mnemosyne suppl. 197), Leiden – Boston – Köln.

Pickard-Cambridge, A., [2]1962 (rev. by T. B. L. Webster). Dithyramb, Tragedy and Comedy, Oxford.

Pickard-Cambridge, A., [3]1988 (revised by J. Gould & D. M. Lewis). The Dramatic Festivals of Athens, Oxford.

Podlecki, A. J., 1990. "Could women attend the theatre in ancient Athens? A collection of testimonia", Ancient World 21, 27–43.

Pomeroy, S. B., 1975. Goddesses, Whores, Wives, and Slaves: Women in Classical Antiquity, New York.

Porson, R., [2]1814. Adversaria. Notae et emendationae in poetas graecos, Leipzig. (abbr. as Adv.)

Porson, R., 1815. Tracts and Miscellaneous Criticisms of the late Richard Porson Esq. (ed. Th. Kidd), London. (abbr. as Misc.)

Powell, J. U. (ed.), 1925. Collectanea Alexandrina: Reliquiae Minores Poetarum Graecorum Aetatis Ptolemaicae, 323–146 A.C., Epicorum, Elegiacorum, Lyricorum, Ethicorum, Oxford.

Pütz, B., [2]2007. The Symposium and Komos in Aristophanes, Oxford.

Rabinowitz, N. S., 2008. Greek Tragedy, Malden.

Rankin, E. M., 1907. The Role of the ΜΑΓΕΙΡΟΙ in the Life of the Ancient Greeks, Chicago.

Reinhardt, U., 1974. Mythologische Beispiele in der Neuen Komödie: Menander, Plautus, Terenz, Diss., Mainz.

Reinhardt, U., 2012. Mythen – Sagen – Märchen: eine Einführung mit exemplarischen Motivreihen, Freiburg im Breisgau.

Reinsberg, C., 1989. Ehe, Hetärentum und Knabenliebe im antiken Griechenland, Munich.

Reiter, H. A., 1991. Athen und die Poleis des Delisch-Attischen Seebundes: die Proxenoi und Euergetai des attischen Demos in den Poleis des Delisch-Attischen Seebundes im

Licht der attischen Proxenie- und Euergesiebeschlüsse des 5. Jahrhunderts v. Chr., Regensburg.

Renehan, R., 1969. Greek Textual Criticism, Cambridge MA.

Reynolds, L. D. & Wilson, N. G., [3]1991. Scribes and Scholars: A Guide to the Transmission of Greek and Latin Literature, Oxford & New York.

Rhodes, P. J., 2006. A History of the Classical Greek World: 478–323 BC, Malden MA.

Ribbeck, O., 1854. "P. Grautoff: Turpilianarum comoediarum reliquiae", Neue Jahrbücher für Philologie und Paedagogik 69, 31–37.

Ribbeck, O., [3]1897–1898. Scaenicae Romanorum Poesis Fragmenta, vol. II: Comicorum Romanorum praeter Plautum et Syri quae feruntur sententias Fragmenta, Leipzig. (abbr. as CRF[3])

Ridgway, B. S., 1987. "Ancient Greek Women and Art: The Material Evidence", AJA 91, 399–409.

Riginos, A. S., 1976. Platonica: The Anecdotes concerning the Life and Writings of Plato, Leiden.

Robert, C., [2]1963. Eratosthenis Catasterismorum Reliquiae: accedunt prolegomena et epimetra tria, Berlin.

Robson, J., 2015. "Fantastic Sex. Fantasies of Sexual Assault in Aristophanes", in M. Masterson, N. S. Rabinowitz, J. Robson (edd.), Sex in Antiquity: Exploring Gender and Sexuality in the Ancient World, Abingdon & New York, 315–331.

Rodenwaldt, G., 1932. "Spinnende Hetären", AA 47, 7–21.

Rohde, E., [5]1974. Der griechische Roman und seine Vorläufer, Hildesheim & New York.

Roisman, H., 1999. Nothing is as it seems: The Tragedy of the Implicit in Euripides' Hippolytus, Lanham.

Rosen, R., 1997. "The Gendered Polis in Eupolis' Cities", in G. W. Dobrov (ed.), The City as Comedy: Society and Representation in Athenian Drama, Chapel Hill, 149–176.

Rösler, W., 1995. "Wine and Truth in the Greek Symposion", in O. Murray & M. Tecusan (edd.), In Vino Veritas, London, 106–112.

Ross, W. D., 1951. Plato's Theory of Ideas, Oxford.

Rothwell, K. S. Jr., 1995. "The Continuity of the Chorus in Fourth-Century Attic Comedy", in G. W. Dobrov (ed.), Beyond Aristophanes: Transition and Diversity in Greek Comedy, Atlanta, 99–118.

Ruffell, I. A., 2011. Politics and Anti-Realism in Athenian Old Comedy: The Art of the Impossible, Oxford & New York.

Sanders, E., Thumiger, C., Carey, C., Lowe N. J. (edd.) 2013. Erôs in Ancient Greece, Oxford.

Satlow, M. L. (ed.), 2013. The Gift in Antiquity, Hoboken NJ.

Schaps, D. M., 1979. Economic Rights of Women in Ancient Greece, Edinburgh.

Schaps, D. M., 2004. The Invention of Coinage and the Monetization of Ancient Greece, Ann Arbor.

Schein, S. L., 1979. The Iambic Trimeter in Aeschylus and Sophocles: A Study in Metrical Form, Leiden.

Schiassi, G., 1951. "De temporum quaestionibus ad atticas iv saeculi meretrices et eiusdem comicas fabulas pertinentibus", RFIC 79, 217–245.

Schmidt, I. O., 1887–1888. "Ulixes Comicus", Jb. Cl. Ph. suppl. 16, 375–403.

Schmidt, M., 1845. Diatribe in Dithyrambum, Berlin.
Schönewolf, H., 1938. Der jungattische Dithyrambos, Diss., Giessen.
Schweighaeuser, I., 1801–1807. Animadversiones in Athenaei Deipnosophistas (post Isaacum Casaubonum), 9 vols, Argentoratum. (abbr. as Animadv.) Seaford, R. A. S., 1994. Reciprocity and Ritual: Homer and Tragedy in the Developing City-State, Oxford & New York.
Seaford, R. A. S., 2001. Euripides Bacchae, Warminster.
Sealey, R., 1984. "On Lawful Concubinage in Athens", ClAnt 3, 111–133.
Searby, D. M., 2007. The Corpus Parisinum. A Critical Edition of the Greek Text with Commentary and English Translation. A Medieval Anthology of Greek Texts from the Pre-Socratics to the Church Fathers, 600 B.C. - 700 A.D., 2 vols, Lewiston NY.
Segal, C., 1993. Euripides and the Poetics of Sorrow: Art, Gender, and Commemoration in Alcestis, Hippolytus, and Hecuba, Durham.
Shapiro, H. A., 1993. Personifications in Greek Art: The Representation of Abstract Concepts, 600–400 B.C., Zürich.
Shorey, P., 1977. "The Idea of the Good in Plato's Republic" in L. Tarán, Selected Papers / Harold Cherniss, 2 vols, Leiden, 2:28–79.
Sifakis, G. M., 1967. Studies in the History of Hellenistic Drama, London.
Silk, M. S., 1993. "Aristophanic Paratragedy", in A. H. Sommerstein et al. (edd.), Tragedy, Comedy and the Polis. Papers from the Greek Drama Conference: Nottingham, 18–20 July 1990, Bari, 477–504.
Silk, M. S., 2000. Aristophanes and the Definition of Comedy, Oxford.
Slater, W. J., 1986. Aristophanis Byzantii Fragmenta, Berlin & New York.
Smyth, H. W., 1956. Greek Grammar, Cambridge MA.
Snell, B., Kannicht, R., Radt, S., 1971–2004. Tragicorum Graecorum Fragmenta, 5 vols, Göttingen. (abbr. as TrGF) Sommerbrodt, E., 1875. De phlyacographis Graecis, Diss., Breslau.
Sommerstein, A. H., 1980. "The Naming of Women in Greek and Roman Comedy", Quaderni di Storia 11, 393–418.
Sommerstein, A. H., 1996a. "Aristophanes and the Demon Poverty", in E. Segal (ed.), Oxford Readings in Aristophanes, Oxford & New York, 252–281.
Sommerstein, A. H., 1996b. "How to avoid being a komodoumenos", CQ 46.2, 327–356.
Sommerstein, A. H., 1998. "Rape and Young Manhood in Athenian Comedy", in L. Foxhall & J. Salmon (edd.), Thinking Men: Masculinity and its Self-Representation in the Classical Tradition, London & New York, 100–114.
Stanley, P. V., 1999. The Economic Reforms of Solon, St. Katharinen.
Starkie, W. J. M., 1909. The Acharnians of Aristophanes, London.
Starkie, W. J. M., 1911. The Clouds of Aristophanes, London.
Stevens, P. T., 1976. Colloquial Expressions in Euripides (Hermes suppl. 38), Wiesbaden.
Stow, H. L., 1936. The Violation of the Dramatic Illusion in the Comedies of Aristophanes, Diss., Chicago.
Strauss, B. S., 1986. Athens after the Peloponnesian War, London & Sydney.
Strömberg, R., 1943. Studien zur Etymologie und Bildung der griechischen Fischnamen, Göteborg.
Sturtevant, E. H., [2]1940. The Pronunciation of Greek and Latin, Philadelphia.

Taaffe, L. K., 1993. Aristophanes and Women, London & New York.
Taillardat, J., 1962. Les Images d'Aristophane: études de langue et de style, Paris.
Taplin, O., 1993. Comic Angels and Other Approaches to Greek Drama through Vase-Paintings, Oxford.
Taplin, O., 1996. "Comedy and the Tragic", in M. S. Silk (ed.), Tragedy and the Tragic. Greek Theatre and Beyond, New York, 188–202.
Taplin, O., 2012. "How was Athenian Tragedy played in the Greek West?", in K. Bosher (ed.), Theater Outside Athens: Drama in Greek Sicily and South Italy, Cambridge, 226–250.
Thompson, D' Arcy W., 1947. A Glossary of Greek Fishes, London.
Thompson, W. E., 1972. "Athenian Marriage Patterns: Remarriage", CSCA 5, 211–225.
Thompson, H. A. & Wycherley, R. E. (edd.), 1972. The Agora of Athens: The History, Shape and Uses of an Ancient City Center, Princeton.
Threatte, L., 1980. The Grammar of Attic Inscriptions, 2 vols, Berlin & New York.
Tod, M. N., 1947. "Epigraphical Notes on Greek Coinage: III. ΟΒΟΛΟΣ", Num.Chron. 7, 1–27.
Tolles, D., 1943. The Banquet-Libations of the Greeks, Ann Arbor.
Traill, J., 1994 – . Persons of Ancient Athens, 21 vols, Toronto. (abbr. as PAA) Trendall, A. D., [2]1967. Phlyax Vases (BICS suppl. 19), London.
Trendall, A. D. & Webster, T. B. L., 1971. Illustrations of Greek Drama, London & New York.
Trümper, M., 2013. "Urban Context of Greek Public Baths", in S. K. Lucore & M. Trümper (edd.), Greek Baths and Bathing Culture: New Discoveries and Approaches, Leuven & Walpole, 33–72.
Tyrrell, W. B., 1982. "Amazon Customs and Athenian Patriarchy", ASNP 12, 1213–1237.
Tziatzi-Papagianni, M., 1994. Die Sprüche der sieben Weise: zwei byzantinische Sammlungen: Einleitung, Text, Testimonien und Kommentar, Stuttgart.
Ubbels, K., 2008. The Maenads: More than Greece's good-time Girls: An Examination in Athenian Image, Text and Historical Evidence, Diss. (ProQuest) Ussher, R. G., 1973. Aristophanes Ecclesiazusae, Oxford.
Vahlen, J., 1967. Opuscula Academica, 2 vols, Hildesheim (reprografischer Nachdruck der Ausgabe Leipzig 1907–1908).
Valente, S., 2015. The Antiatticist. Introduction and Critical Edition, Berlin & Boston. (abbr. as Val.)
Van Groningen, B. A., 1966. Theognis, le premier livre, Amsterdam.
Van Leeuwen, J., 1893. Aristophanis Vespae. Cum prolegomenis et commentariis, Leiden.
Van Leeuwen, J., 1898. Aristophanis Nubes. Cum prolegomenis et commentariis, Leiden.
Van Leeuwen, J., 1900. Aristophanis Equites. Cum prolegomenis et commentariis, Leiden.
Van Leeuwen, J., 1904. Aristophanis Plutus. Cum prolegomenis et commentariis, Leiden.
Van Ophuijsen, J. M., van Raalte, M., Stork, P. (edd.), 2013. Protagoras of Abdera: The Man, his Measure, Leiden & Boston.
Versnel, H. S., 1987. "Greek Myth and Ritual: The Case of Kronos", in J. Bremmer (ed.), Interpretations of Greek Mythology, London, 121–152.
Vickers, M., 1994. "Attic Symposia after the Persian Wars", in O. Murray (ed.), Sympotica: A Symposium on the Symposion, Oxford & New York, 105–121.

Vierneisel, K. & Kaeser, B. (edd.), 1990. Kunst der Schale: Kultur des Trinkens, München.
Viré, G. (ed.), 1992. Hygini De Astronomia, Stuttgart & Leipzig.
Voigt, E.-M., 1971. Sappho et Alcaeus, Amsterdam.
Von Arnim, H. F. A., 1903–1924. Stoicorum Veterum Fragmenta, 4 vols, Leipzig. (abbr. as SVF) Voskos, A., ²2008. Αρχαία Κυπριακὴ Γραμματεία, vol. 1: Ποίηση: Ἐπική, Λυρική, Δραματική, Nicosia.
Wackernagel, J., ²1926–1928. Vorlesungen über Syntax, 2 vols, Basel.
Wagner-Hasel, B., 2013. "Marriage Gifts in Ancient Greece", in M. L. Satlow (ed.), The Gift in Antiquity, Hoboken NJ, 158–172.
Walbank, M. B., 1978. Athenian Proxenies of the Fifth Century BC, Toronto & Sarasota.
Wankel, H., 1976. Demosthenes, Rede für Ktesiphon über den Kranz, Heidelberg.
Waterfield, R., 2000. The First Philosophers: The Presocratics and Sophists, Oxford & New York.
Weber, M., 1996. Antike Badekultur, Munich.
Webster, T. B. L., 1948. "South Italian Vases and Attic Drama", CQ 42, 15–27.
Webster, T. B. L., 1952. "Chronological Notes on Middle Comedy", CQ 2 (n.s.), 13–26.
Webster, T. B. L., ²1960. Studies in Menander, Manchester.
Webster, T. B. L., ²1970. Studies in Later Greek Comedy, Manchester.
Webster, T. B. L., 1974. An Introduction to Menander, Manchester.
Webster, T. B. L. & Green, J. R., ³1978. Monuments Illustrating Old and Middle Comedy (BICS suppl. 39), London.
Wehrli, F., ²1967–1969. Die Schule des Aristoteles. Texte und Kommentare, 10 vols, Basel.
Weiher, A., 1913. Philosophen und Philosophenspott in der attischen Komödie, Diss., Munich.
West, M. L., 1962. Poetae Melici Graeci, Oxford. (abbr. as PMG) West, M. L., 1973. Textual Criticism and Editorial Technique, Stuttgart.
West, M. L., 1974. Studies in Greek Elegy and Iambus, Berlin & New York.
West, M. L., 1982. Greek Metre, Oxford.
West, M. L., ²1989–1992. Iambi et Elegi Graeci, 2 vols, Oxford.
White, J. W., 1912. The Verse of Greek Comedy, London.
Wilamowitz-Moellendorff von U., 1873. "Observationes Criticae in Comoediam Atticam", Hermes 7, 140–158.
Wilamowitz-Moellendorff von U., 1913. Sappho und Simonides: Untersuchungen über griechische Lyriker, Berlin.
Wilamowitz-Moellendorff von U., 1937 (ed. by L. Malten). Kleine Schriften, vol. V.2: Glaube und Sage, Berlin.
Wiles, D., 2001. "Marriage and Prostitution in Classical New Comedy" in E. Segal (ed.), Oxford Readings in Menander, Plautus, and Terence, Oxford, 42–64.
Wilkins, J., 2000. The Boastful Chef: The Discourse of Food in Ancient Greek Comedy, Oxford.
Wilkins, J. & Shaun, H., 2006. Food in the Ancient World, Malden MA & Oxford.
Willetts, R. F., 1959. "The Servile Interregnum at Argos", Hermes 87, 495–506.
Williamson, M., 1995. Sappho's Immortal Daughters, Cambridge MA.
Wilson, N. G., 2016. The Greek Classics. Aldus Manutius, Cambridge MA.

Wilson, P., 1999. "The aulos in Athens", in S. Goldhill & R. Osborne (edd.), Performance Culture and Athenian Democracy, Cambridge, 58–95.

Wilson, P., 2000. The Athenian Institution of the Khoregia: the Chorus, the City and the Stage, Cambridge.

Winkler, J. J., 1990. "Laying down the law: The oversight of men's sexual behavior in classical Athens", in D. M. Halperin, J. J. Winkler, F. I. Zeitlin (edd.), Before Sexuality: The Construction of Erotic Experience in the Ancient Greek World, Princeton, 171–210.

Winter, F. E., 2006. Studies in Hellenistic Architecture (Phoenix suppl. 42), Toronto.

Worthington, I. (ed. in chief), 2007 – . Brill's New Jacoby, Brill Online. (abbr. as BNJ)

Wrenhaven, K. L., 2009. "The Identity of the 'Wool-Workers' in the Attic Manumissions", Hesperia 78.3, 367–386.

Yegül, F., 1992. Baths and Bathing in Classical Antiquity, Cambridge MA.

Zieliński, Th., 1931. Iresione I. Dissertationes ad comoediam et tragoediam spectantes continens, Leopoli.

Zimmermann, B., 1984–1987. Untersuchungen zur Form und dramatischen Technik der Aristophanischen Komödien, 3 vols (vol. 1 [1984] Parodos und Amoibaion; vol. 2 [1985] Die anderen lyrischen Partien; vol. 3 [1987] Metrische Analysen), Königstein/Ts.

Zimmermann, B., 1991. Greek Tragedy: An Introduction, Baltimore.

Zimmermann, B., 1992. Dithyrambos: Geschichte einer Gattung, Göttingen.

Zimmermann, B., 2006. Die griechische Komödie, Frankfurt am Main.

Indices

1. Index fontium

Antiatticista Lexicon
δ 29: Amphis fr. 32: 209
κ 83: Amphis fr. 12: 83
Aratus Latinus (Maass 1898: 181): Amphis fr. 46: 267
Athenaeus Deipnosophistae
1.8c: Amphis fr. 39: 245
1.30b: Amphis fr. 40: 250
1.30e–f: Amphis fr. 36: 230
1.34e: Amphis fr. 37: 235
2.44a: Amphis fr. 41: 256
2.48a: Amphis fr. 45: 264
2.50f: Amphis fr. 38: 240
2.57b–c: Amphis fr. 26: 165
2.67b: Amphis fr. 40.1: 250
2.69b–c: Amphis fr. 20: 132
3.100a: Amphis fr. 28: 180
3.123d–e: Amphis fr. 7: 57
4.168b–c: Amphis fr. 43: 261
4.175a–b: Amphis fr. 14: 97–98
6.224d–e: Amphis fr. 30: 191
7.277c: Amphis fr. 26: 163, 165
7.295e–f: Amphis fr. 16: 114
7.295f: Amphis fr. 35: 225
7.309a: Amphis fr. 22: 143
8.336c: Amphis fr. 8: 62
Amphis fr. 21: 138
9.386e–f: Amphis fr. 10: 74
10.421a: Amphis fr. 29: 186
10.423a: Amphis fr. 31: 204
10.426a: Amphis fr. 18: 119–120, 127
10.447f–448b: Amphis fr. 33: 212
13.559a–b: Amphis fr. 1: 21
13.563c: Amphis fr. 15: 106
13.567f–568a: Amphis fr. 23: 150
13.591d: Amphis fr. 24: 158
14.642a–b: Amphis fr. 9: 68
15.691a: Amphis fr. 27: 171
Diogenes Laertius Vitae
3.27: Amphis fr. 6: 50
3.28: Amphis fr. 13: 87
Eustathius Commentarium ad Homeri Iliadem 1.633.8–9: Amphis fr. 10: 74
Hesychius ε 6950: Amphis fr. 11: 79
Hyginus Astronomica 2.1: Amphis fr. 46: 267
IG II^{3} 347: Amphis Test. 2: 18–19
Marcian of Heraclea exc. 33 on [Erat.] Catasterismi (compl. by Aratus Latinus): Amphis fr. 47: 268
Photius Lexicon
ν 73: Amphis fr. 19: 130
Pollux Onomasticon
2.33: Amphis fr. 49: 272
3.36: Amphis fr. 48: 270
7.17: Amphis Aleiptria: 32
7.125: Amphis Koniatēs: 147
7.170: Amphis fr. 5: 45
7.203: Amphis fr. 25: 160
9.88: Amphis fr. 5: 45
10.170: Amphis fr. 2: 36
Scholia on Aratus Phaenomena 37–44: Amphis fr. 46: 267
Scholia on Germanicus' Latin version of Aratus: Amphis fr. 47: 268–269
Scholia on Plato Gorgias 497a: Amphis' Accō: 30 Stobaeus Florilegium
3.27.4: Amphis fr. 42: 259
3.33.6: Amphis fr. 44: 263
4.15^{a}.4: Amphis fr. 17: 121
4.18.1: Amphis fr. 3: 39
4.35.16: Amphis fr. 34: 219
4.40.6: Amphis fr. 4: 44
Suda
α 1760: Amphis Test. 1: 18
ν 113: Amphis fr. 19: 130
σ 706: Amphis fr. 13: 87

2. Index verborum

* All fragments mentioned are by Amphis

 The words outside the parentheses are the precise terms (i.e. same case, number, tense, mode, etc.) that occur in Amphis' fragments ἀβέλτεροι (ἀβέλτερος, -ον / -α, -ον): fr. 41.2: 256, 258–259 ἀγαθοῖς (ἀγαθόν, τό): fr. 28.2: 180–182, 184 ἀγαθόν (ἀγαθόν, τό): fr. 6.1: 49, 51–53 ἀγοράζων (ἀγοράζω): fr. 26.1: 165, 167–168 ἀγρόν (ἀγρός, ὁ): fr. 12: 83–84 ἀγρός (ἀγρός, ὁ): fr. 17.2: 121–122, 125 ἀθάνατος (-ος, -ον): fr. 8.2: 61, 64–65

Ἀθήνησιν: fr. 14.4: 97, 103
Ἀκάνθιος (Ἀκάνθιος, -α, -ον): fr. 36.1: 230, 232–233 ἀκήκοας (ἀκούω): fr. 27.4: 171, 176 ἀκύλους (ἄκυλος, ὁ): fr. 38.2: 240, 244 ἀλείφειν (ἀλείφω): fr. 27.2: 171, 175 ἀληθινῶν (ἀληθινός, -ή, -όν): fr. 26.2: 165–166, 168 ἀληθῶς (ἀληθής, -ές): fr. 15.4: 106, 111 ἀληλεμένον (ἀλέω): fr. 9.2: 67, 69–70 ἄμητες (ἄμης, ὁ): fr. 9.3: 67, 70–71 ἀναγκαίαν (ἀναγκαῖος, -α, -ον): fr. 20.6: 132, 137–138 ἀνατριαινώσει (ἀνατριαινόω): fr. 14.8: 15, 97, 105 ἀνδροφόνοι (ἀνδροφόνος, -ον): fr. 30.8: 191, 200–201 ἀνεβόησ' (ἀναβοάω): fr. 7: 57, 59–60 ἀνιώμενος (ἀνιάω,-ῶ): fr. 34.1: 219, 221 ἀξιωθῆναι (ἀξιόω): fr. 30.1: 190, 198 ἅπασιν (ἅπας, -ασα, -αν): fr. 34.2: 219, 222 ἀπιτέον (ἄπειμι): fr. 1.5: 21, 23, 28–29 ἀπολουμέναις (ἀπόλλυμι): fr. 20.1: 132, 135 ἀπόπληκτος (ἀπόπληκτος, -ον): fr. 23.5: 150, 157 ἄστυ (ἄστυ, τό): fr. 17.4: 121, 126–127 ἀσυμβόλου (ἀσύμβολος, -ον): fr. 39.1: 245, 248 ἀτελές (ἀτελής, -ές): fr. 29: 16, 186, 188 ἀτυχήσῃ (ἀτυχέω): fr. 4.1: 38, 44–45 ἀτυχίας (ἀτυχία, ἡ): fr. 3.1: 38–39 / fr. 17.4: 121, 126–127 αὐλητρίς (αὐλητρίς, ἡ): fr. 9.4: 67–68, 70, 73 βασιλικήν (βασιλικός, -ή, -όν): fr. 27.3: 171, 176 βίον (βίος, ὁ): fr. 9.1: 67–68, 70 / fr. 33.1: 211 βίῳ (βίος, ὁ): fr. 3.2: 39 / fr. 21.1: 138, 141 βολῶν (ὀβολός, ὁ): fr. 30.13: 191, 202–203 γαμετῆς (γαμετή, ἡ): fr. 1.2: 21, 27
Γέλᾳ (Γέλα, ἡ): fr. 40.1: 250, 254–255 γέμον (γέμω): fr. 17.4: 121–122, 126 γίγγραν (γίγγρας, ὁ): fr. 14.1: 97, 99, 101 γλαυκινιδίου (γλαυκινίδιον, τό): fr. 35.2: 15, 225–228 γλαῦκοι (γλαῦκος, ὁ): fr. 16.1: 113, 116 γλαύκου (γλαῦκος, ὁ): fr. 22.2: 143–144 γυναικός (γυνή, ἡ): fr. 1.1: 21, 27 / fr. 20.3: 132, 136 δείπνου (δεῖπνον, τό): fr. 39.1: 245, 248 δή: fr. 6.3: 49, 54–55
διαλελογίσθαι (διαλογίζομαι): fr. 33.9: 211, 213, 218, 257 διαπαρθένια (τά): fr. 48: 15, 270–272 διὰ τέλους: fr. 30.4: 211, 214, 217 διενεχθῆναι (διαφέρω): fr. 32: 209 δικαίως: fr. 30.7: 191, 201
Διοσκόρω (Διόσκοροι, οἱ): fr. 9.4: 67, 73 δρῶν (δράω): fr. 20.5: 132, 134, 136–137 δυσάρεστον (δυσάρεστος, -ον): fr. 34.1: 219–222 δυστυχής (δυστυχής, -ές): fr. 21.4: 138, 142 δυσχερῶς (δυσχερής, -ές): fr. 34.2: 219–222 δώδεκα θεῶν (δώδεκα θεοί): fr. 9.5: 67, 73–75 δῶρα (δῶρον, τό): fr. 48: 15, 270–271 ἐγχελύδιον (τό): fr. 35.1: 225–227 εἰσέρχεται (εἰσέρχομαι): fr. 23.2: 150, 154

εἶτα: fr. 36.1: 230, 233 / εἶτ' οὐ: fr. 1.1: 21, 25–26 / εἶτ' οὐχί: fr. 17.1: 121, 124 εἰωθότων (ἔθω/εἴωθα): fr. 33.3: 211, 216 ἐκ: fr. 21.4: 138, 142 ἑκάστης (ἕκαστος, -η, -ον): fr. 43: 261, 263 ἔκρουσε (κρούω): fr. 30.10: 191, 193, 200–202 ἔκυψεν (κύπτω): fr. 30.6: 191, 193–194, 199–200 ἕν (εἷς, μία, ἕν): fr. 20.4: 132–133, 136–137 ἔνδον: fr. 1.3: 21, 27–28 / fr. 23.5: 150, 152, 157 ἐνῆν (ἔνειμι): fr. 41.1: 256–257 ἐνοχλῶν (ἐνοχλέω): fr. 15.5: 106, 111–112 ἐντός: fr. 20.2: 132, 136
ἐξεύρημα (ἐξεύρημα, τό): fr. 14.2: 97, 99–102 ἑξήκοντ' (ἑξήκοντα): fr. 20.2: 132, 136 ἐπηρκώς (ἐπαίρω): fr. 13.3: 87, 92–93 ἐπιορκεῖν (ἐπιορκέω): fr. 42.2: 259–261 ἐπρήσθη (πρήθω): fr. 30.10: 191, 193–194, 201–202 ἐραστής (ἐραστής, ὁ): fr. 15.2: 106–107, 109–111 ἐρημία (ἐρημία, ἡ): fr. 17.1: 26, 121, 124, 126 ἐρίοισι (ἔριον, τό): fr. 27.1: 171, 174 ἑσπέραν (ἑσπέρα, ἡ): fr. 28.1: 180–181, 183, 262 ἐτῶν (ἔτος, τό): fr. 20.2: 132, 136 εὐκυβεῖν (εὐκυβέω): fr. 11: 15, 79–81 εὐνοϊκώτερον (εὐνοϊκός, -ον): fr. 1.1: 21–22, 26–27, 220 Εὐρύβατε (Εὐρύβατος, ὁ): fr. 10.1: 74, 76–77 εὔσαρκα (εὔσαρκος, -ον): fr. 16.2: 113–115, 117–118 ἔχειν (ἔχω): fr. 33.3: 211, 216 / fr. 35.1: 225, 227 ζῆν (ζώω): fr. 17.2: 16, 121, 124–125 ἥδεται (ἥδομαι): fr. 4.2: 44–45 ἤδη: fr. 9.1: 67, 69 / fr. 27.4: 171 ἡδύς (-εῖα, -ύ): fr. 9.3: 67, 71–72 ἤθη (ἦθος, τό): fr. 36.4: 230, 234–235 ἡμέρας (ἡμέρα, ἡ): fr. 43: 261–263 ἡμέτερον (ἡμέτερος, -α, -ον): fr. 14.3: 97, 99, 102 θέατρον (θέατρον, τό): fr. 17.4: 121, 126–127 θερμόν (θερμός, -ή, -όν): fr. 7: 57, 60 / fr. 33.10: 211, 218–219 θεῶν (θεός, ὁ): fr. 9.5: 67, 73–74 / fr. 21.4: 138, 142 / fr. 36.1: 230 Θουρίοις (Θούριοι, οἱ): fr. 40.1: 250, 254 θριδακίναις (θριδακίνη, ἡ): fr. 20.1: 132, 134–135 Ἰκάριος (Ἰκάριος, -α, -ον): fr. 40.2: 250, 254–255 ἰσχάδες (ἰσχάς, ἡ): fr. 40.2: 250, 255 ἰχθύων (ἰχθύς, ὁ): fr. 26.2: 165–166, 168 καθαρείως: fr. 35.1: 225–227 κάθητ' (κάθημαι): fr. 23.5: 150, 157 καί: fr. 39.2: 245–246, 249 κατακεχρημένον (καταχράομαι): fr. 14.4: 97, 99, 103 καταράτους (κατάρατος, -ον): fr. 30.4: 190, 196–199 καταφρονοῦσ' (καταφρονέω): fr. 1.3: 21, 27 κέρμα (κέρμα, τό): fr. 5: 45–47 κέστρα (κέστρα, ἡ): fr. 30.13: 191, 203 κεφάλαια (κεφάλαιον, τό): fr. 35.2: 117, 225, 228 Κιμώλιαι (Κιμώλιος, -α, -ον): fr. 40.2: 250, 255 κνισολοιχέ (κνισολοιχός, ὁ): fr. 10.1: 74, 77–78 κοινωνίαν (κοινωνία, ἡ): fr. 20.3: 132, 136 κόμαρος (ὁ / ἡ): fr. 38.2: 240, 244 κορακῖνον (κορακῖνος, ὁ): fr. 22.1: 143–144 κοχλίας (κοχλίας, ὁ): fr. 13.3: 87, 91–92 κρανίων (κρανίον, τό): fr. 16.1: 113–114, 116–118 κριταῖς (κριτής, ὁ): fr. 21.4: 138, 140–142 κρότοις (κρότος, ὁ): fr. 14.8: 97, 105–106 κτώ (ὀκτώ): fr. 30.13: 120, 191, 194, 202–203 λαβρακίου (λαβράκιον, τό): fr. 35.2: 225–226, 228 λαχεῖν (λαγχάνω): fr. 14.7: 97, 104

λέληθε (λανθάνω): fr. 3.4: 39, 43 λεπτῶς (λεπτός, -ή, -όν): fr. 30.5: 211, 214, 217–218 λῆρον (λῆρος, ὁ): fr. 37.4: 235–236, 238–239 λιπεῖν (λείπω): fr. 39.2: 245–247, 249 λόγος (λόγος, ὁ): fr. 41.1: 256–257 λόγου (λόγος, ὁ): fr. 30.2: 190, 197–198
Λύκᾳ (Λύκα, ἡ): fr. 23.3: 150, 155–156 λύπην (λύπη, ἡ): fr. 37.3: 235, 237, 239 μαθήματος (μάθημα, τό): fr. 3.3: 39, 42–43 μαίνεται (μαίνομαι): fr. 26.3: 144, 165, 169 μάλ' εἰκότως: fr. 1.2: 21, 27 μάταιος (μάταιος, -α, -ον): fr. 21.3: 138, 141, 143 Μεγαλλείῳ μύρῳ (Μεγάλλειον μύρον, τό): fr. 27.2: 171–172, 175 μέθης (μέθη, ἡ): fr. 37.1: 41, 235, 239 μετάκερας: fr. 7: 16, 57, 60
μετώπῳ (μέτωπον, τό): fr. 33.3: 211, 213, 216
Μιλησίοις (Μιλήσιος, -α, -ον): fr. 27.1: 171, 174 μιμαίκυλα (μιμαίκυλον, τό): fr. 38.2: 240, 244 μίνδακα (μίνδαξ, ἡ): fr. 27.3: 15, 171, 175–176 μοίραις (μοῖρα, ἡ): fr. 30.2: 190, 198 μυρίαις (μύριος, -α, -ον): fr. 30.1: 190, 198 μύρον (μύρον, τό): fr. 9.4: 67, 72 μύρῳ (μύρον, τό): fr. 27.2: 171, 175
Ναννίῳ (Νάννιον, τό): fr. 23.3: 150, 155–156 νεανικόν (νεανικός, -ή, -όν): fr. 33.9: 130, 211, 218–219 νόμιζε (νομίζω): fr. 39.2: 245, 249 νόμῳ (νόμος, ὁ): fr. 1.3: 21, 27 νοῦν (νοῦς, ὁ): fr. 33.3: 211, 213, 216–217, 257 νοῦς (νοῦς, ὁ): fr. 3.3: 39, 42–43 νύκτ' (νύξ, ἡ): fr. 20.4: 132, 136 οἶνον (οἶνος, ὁ): fr. 37.4: 235, 238–239 οἶνος (οἶνος, ὁ): fr. 9.3: 67–68, 71–72 / fr. 40.2: 250, 254–255 οἴνου (οἶνος, ὁ): fr. 36.2: 230, 233–234 οἴνῳ (οἶνος, ὁ): fr. 41.1: 256–257 οἶσθα (οἶδα): fr. 13.2: 86–88, 91 ὀλβιογάστωρ (ὀλβιογάστωρ, ὁ): fr. 10.2: 74–78 ὅλοι (ὅλος, -η, -ον): fr. 16.1: 113, 116 ὁρᾷς (ὁράω): fr. 38.1: 240–241, 243–244 ὅστις (ὅστις, ἥτις, ὅ τι): fr. 15.2: 106–107, 109/ fr. 21.1: 138, 140–141 / fr. 22.1: 143–144 / fr. 23.2: 150, 154 / fr. 26.1: 165–167 / fr. 39.1: 245, 248 / fr. 42.1: 259–260 οὐδεπώποτε: fr. 14.3: 97, 103
οὐκ ἔσθ' ὅπως (οὐκ ἔστιν ὅπως): fr. 10.1: 74–75, 77–78 οὐκ ἔστιν οὐδέν: fr. 3.1: 39–41 / fr. 37.1–2: 235, 239 ὀφρῦς (ὀφρῦς, ἡ): fr. 13.3: 87, 92–93 ὄχλον (ὄχλος, ὁ): fr. 14.6: 97, 103–104 ὄψον (ὄψον, τό): fr. 26.1: 71, 165, 168, 203, 227 ὀψωνοῦντα (ὀψωνέω): fr. 30.14: 168, 191, 203 παγίσι (παγίς, ἡ): fr. 23.4: 150, 152, 156–157 παῖζε (παίζω): fr. 8.1: 61–64 παραδεδειπνημένος (παραδειπνέομαι): fr. 31: 204–206 παρακειμένων (παράκειμαι): fr. 30.6: 191, 199 παρακόμους (παράκομος, -ον): fr. 49: 15, 272–273 παραμύθιον (παραμύθιον, τό): fr. 3.2: 39, 41–42 παροινίαν (παροινία, ἡ): fr. 29: 186, 188–189 πᾶσιν (πᾶς, πᾶσα, πᾶν): fr. 28.2: 180–182, 184 πατήρ (πατήρ, ὁ): fr. 17.2: 16, 121, 124–125 πατρίδος (πατρίς, ἡ): fr. 36.3: 230, 234 πείσειν (πείθω): fr. 15.1: 106, 108 πενίαν (πενία, ἡ): fr. 17.3: 121, 125–126 περιθέτην (περιθέτη, ἡ): fr. 2: 36–37 πίνοντες (πίνω): fr. 41.2: 71, 256–258 πίνουσ' (πίνω): fr. 43: 261–263
Πλάτων (ὁ): fr. 13.1: 87, 90, 92
Πλάτωνος (Πλάτων, ὁ): fr. 6.3: 49, 52–54

πλοῦτος (πλοῦτος, ὁ): fr. 23.1: 150–151, 153–154 πολίτης (πολίτης, ὁ): fr. 36.2: 230, 233–234 πουλύπουν (πουλύπους, ὁ): fr. 30.10: 191, 193, 201–202 πράγματ' (πρᾶγμα, τό): fr. 14.8: 97, 105 πρίασθαι (πρίαμαι): fr. 26.3: 165, 169 πρῖνος (ὁ / ἡ): fr. 38.2: 240, 244 πρόσεχε (προσέχω): fr. 6.3: 49, 54–55 προσπεσεῖν (προσπίπτω): fr. 37.2: 235, 239 προσφέρειν (προσφέρω): fr. 21.2: 138, 141 προχείρως (πρόχειρος, -ον): fr. 30.7: 211, 214, 218 πυκνῶς (πυκνός, -ή, -όν): fr. 30.5: 211, 214, 217–218 πώποτε: fr. 27.4: 171, 176 ῥᾳδίως (ῥᾴδιος, -α, -ον): fr. 42.2: 259–261 ῥαφανῖδας (ῥαφανίς, ἡ): fr. 26.3: 165, 168–169 ῥαφάνους (ῥάφανος, ἡ): fr. 37.4: 235, 239 ῥαχιστά (ῥαχιστός, -ή, -όν): fr. 16.1: 15, 113, 115–118 σαφοῦς (σαφής, -ές): fr. 17.4: 121–122, 126–127 σησαμαῖ (σησαμῆ, ἡ): fr. 9.3: 67, 72 Σινώπῃ (Σινώπη, ἡ): fr. 23.3: 150, 154–155 σιωπᾶν (σιωπάω): fr. 44: 263–264 σιωπῇ (σιωπή, ἡ): fr. 30.7: 191, 200 σκιραφευτήν (σκιραφευτής, ὁ): fr. 25: 15, 160–161 σκυθρωπάζειν (σκυθρωπάζω): fr. 13.2: 87–88, 91 σοβείτω (σοβέω): fr. 18: 127–129 σοφοῖς (σοφός, -ή, -όν): fr. 21.3: 138, 140–142 σοφώτατον (σοφός, -ή, -όν): fr. 14.1: 97, 101 στέφανος (στέφανος, ὁ): fr. 9.4: 67, 72 στρατηγούς (στρατηγός, ὁ): fr. 30.1: 190, 197 στρέφοιθ' (στρέφω): fr. 20.4: 132, 136 στρυφνός (στρυφνός, -ή, -όν): fr. 36.2: 230–232, 234 συγκρύπτειν (συγκρύπτω): fr. 17.3: 121, 125–126 συκάμιν' (συκάμινον, τό): fr. 38.1: 240–241, 243 συκάμινος (ὁ / ἡ): fr. 38.1: 16, 240–243 συμφοράς (συμφορά, ἡ): fr. 3.4: 38–39, 43 συντετάχθαι (συντάσσω): fr. 33.4: 211, 214, 216 συχνούς (συχνός, -ή, -όν): fr. 18: 127–129 σώφρων (σώφρων, -ον): fr. 15.4: 106–107, 111 τάξιν (τάξις, ἡ): fr. 39.2: 245, 247, 249–250 τάρων (τέσσαρες, -α): fr. 30.12: 120, 191, 194, 202–203 ταύτην (οὗτος, αὕτη, τοῦτο): fr. 6.2: 49–50, 52 / fr. 23.2: 150, 154, 156–157, 159 ταυτί (οὗτος, αὕτη, τοῦτο): fr. 15.1: 106, 108 τεμάχια (τεμάχιον, τό): fr. 35.3: 225–226, 228–229 τερπνόν (τερπνός, -ή, -όν): fr. 21.2: 138, 141 τέχνης (τέχνη, ἡ): fr. 3.2: 39–40, 42
Τήλεφος (ὁ): fr. 30.6: 191, 200 τοίχους (τοίχος, ὁ): fr. 27.1: 171, 173–175 τοῦτ' ἐκεῖνο: fr. 9.2: 67–68, 70 τοῦτον (οὗτος, αὕτη, τοῦτο): fr. 39.2: 245, 249 τρίβων (τρίβω): fr. 20.6: 132, 138 τρίκλινον (τρίκλινος, -ον): fr. 45.2: 264, 266 τρόποις (τρόπος, ὁ): fr. 1.4: 21–22, 28 / fr. 36.3: 230, 234–235 τρόπων (τρόπος, ὁ): fr. 15.3: 106, 110–111 τυφλός (τυφλός, -ή, -όν): fr. 23.1: 150–151, 153–154 τύχην (τύχη, ἡ): fr. 20.6: 132, 134, 137–138, 142 ὕδωρ (τό): fr. 7: 57, 60 / fr. 41.2: 256–258 ὑποστρώσεις (ὑποστόρνυμι): fr. 45.1: 264–266 ὑπουργίας (ὑπουργία, ἡ): fr. 20.5: 132, 137

ὑστερεῖ (ὑστερέω): fr. 39.1: 245, 248–249 φακοί (φακός, ὁ): fr. 40.1: 250–251, 254–255 φάρμακον (τό): fr. 37.1: 235, 238–239 φέρει (φέρω): fr. 38.1: 240–241, 244 φῄς (φημί): fr. 15.1: 106, 108 φιλονικοῦσαν (φιλονικέω): fr. 14.7: 97, 104 φιλοποτῶν (φιλοπότης, ὁ): fr. 33.2: 211, 214–216, 218 φρένας (φρήν, ἡ): fr. 22.2: 143–144 φρόνησις (ἡ): fr. 30.5: 211, 214, 217, 257 φυλήν (φυλή, ἡ): fr. 14.6: 97, 104 χειρί (χείρ, ἡ): fr. 20.6: 132, 137 χορταζόμενα (χορτάζω): fr. 28.1: 180–181, 183–184, 262–263 χρυσοῦν (χρυσοῦς, -ῆ, -οῦν): fr. 17.1: 121, 124 ὠνητέος (ὠνέομαι): fr. 1.4: 21–23, 28–29 ὡραῖον (ὡραῖος, -α, -ον): fr. 15.2: 106–107, 109–110

3. Index locorum

* Plays, fragments, passages, and line numbers are followed by page numbers

Accius
Athamas: 20
Achaeus
Alcmeon: 36
Adespota fragmenta comica
fr. 133: 56; fr. 622: 77; fr. 1013: 74
Adespota fragmenta tragica
fr. 95: 138–139
Aelian
De Natura Animalium
1.30: 228; 17.34: 174
Aeschines
1.11: 136; 1.24: 136; 1.42: 80, 110; 1.135: 112; 1.179: 217; 3.176: 250
Aeschylus Agamemnon
l. 620: 77; l. 1169: 184; l. 1279: 142
Athamas: 20
Callisto: 145
Choephoroi l. 1006: 142
Eumenides
l. 448: 200; l. 728: 71
Mysoi: 200
Persai
l. 373: 142; l. 426: 116
Prometheus Vinctus l. 251: 239
Septem contra Thebas: 113
ll. 2–3: 43; l. 23: 142; l. 250: 265; l. 253: 234; l. 603: 219
fr. 355: 96
Aesop
Fabulae 157: 242
Agathon
Alcmeon: 36
Alcaeus (Comicus)
Callisto: 145
Palaestra: 56
Alcaeus (Lyricus)
fr. 326: 43; fr. 346: 63
Alciphro
2.15: 188; 2.30: 188; 3.19: 188
Alexis
[Aleiptria]: 16, 32
Ampelourgos: 16, 38
Daktylios: 16, 82
Hepta epi Thēbas: 16, 113
Gynaikokratia: 16, 61
Kubeutai: 16, 160
Kouris: 16, 148
Opora: 177
Pannychis or Erithoi: 16, 119
fr. 1: 89; fr. 9: 84, 90, 103, 243; fr. 16: 16, 92–93, 135, 192, 194–195, 199; fr. 18: 144; fr. 20: 199; fr. 22: 90; [fr. 25]: 62; fr. 44: 26; fr. 57: 195; fr. 70: 107; fr. 76: 192; fr. 78: 192; fr. 88: 129; fr. 98: 51; fr. 103: 24, 59, 117; fr. 109: 155; fr. 113: 142; fr. 115: 116; fr. 122: 255; fr. 124: 96; fr. 129: 90; fr. 130: 248; fr. 131: 124, 217; fr. 132: 70; fr. 133: 46; fr. 137:

228; fr. 141: 58, 60; fr. 145: 26; fr. 148: 31; fr. 151: 54; fr. 153: 246, 248, 252; fr. 159: 171; fr. 160: 186; fr. 163: 54, 89; fr. 168: 73; fr. 177: 115, 246; fr. 178: 102–103; fr. 183: 200; fr. 190: 71; fr. 191: 110, 251; fr. 204: 47; fr. 215: 186; fr. 217: 88, 91; fr. 224: 103; fr. 244: 109; fr. 247: 258; fr. 252: 72; fr. 271: 193, 249; fr. 273: 139; fr. 274: 54; fr. 279: 43; fr. 281: 92; fr. 285: 215; fr. 290: 108
Amipsias
Connus: 54, 89
Sappho: 207
fr. 9: 90, 141
Anaxandrides
Anterōs: 108
Gerontomania: 66, 136
fr. 3: 105; fr. 20: 54, 89; fr. 28: 29, 228; fr. 29: 168; fr. 31: 96, 116; fr. 34: 110, 192; fr. 42: 69–70, 114, 201, 266; fr. 47: 172, 175; fr. 55: 103–104; fr. 72: 266
Anaxilas
fr. 21: 137; fr. 22: 24, 59, 153, 155–156, 224, 264; fr. 28: 168; fr. 33: 91
Anaxippus
fr. 1: 27, 116; fr. 6: 58
Anthologia Palatina
6.170: 239; 9.525.16: 78; 12.232.6: 137
Antiphanes
Aleiptria: 32
Anterōsa: 108
Athamas: 20
Dyserōtes: 108
Kubeutai: 160
Kouris: 148
Mylōn: 56
fr. 19: 71, 211; fr. 23: 155; fr. 26: 32; fr. 27: 90, 155, 167, 196; fr. 42: 189; fr. 43: 155; fr. 45: 117, 228; fr. 57: 55; fr. 64: 77; fr. 80: 76; fr. 97: 203; fr. 101: 26, 108; fr. 107: 98; fr. 114: 155; fr. 129: 45–46; fr. 130: 117; fr. 138: 68; fr. 145: 226–227; fr. 157: 26, 192; fr. 159: 41; fr. 164: 192; fr. 165: 125; fr. 168: 155; fr. 172: 68; fr. 173: 124; fr. 175: 82; fr. 177: 255; fr. 189: 36; fr. 190: 203; fr. 193: 76; fr. 204: 166, 194; fr. 205: 95; fr. 207: 95; fr. 210: 24, 154; fr. 216: 96; fr. 217: 91–93; fr. 221: 58, 116, 227–228; fr. 223: 70; fr. 233: 73; fr. 237: 260; fr. 239: 57; fr. 261: 140; fr. 273: 168; fr. 292: 266; fr. 293: 238; fr. 322: 125
Antipho 6.11: 104
Apollodorus
Bibliotheca
1.4.1: 185; 1.9.1–2: 20; 3.4.3: 20; 3.8.2: 145, 267; 3.14.4: 135; 3.80–95: 35
Apollodorus Carystius
fr. 5: 139; fr. 8: 109; fr. 32: 236, 239
Apollodorus Carystius vel Gelous fr. 16: 63
Apollonius Rhodius
Argonautica 3.1195: 145
Araros
The Birth of Pan: 185
fr. 16: 78
Archedicus fr. 3: 116, 194, 228, 252 Archestratus
fr. 16: 142; fr. 20: 144, 168; fr. 21: 116; fr. 60: 72
Archilochus
fr. 2: 63; fr. 4: 63; fr. 48: 136; fr. 120: 94; fr. 327: 239
Archippus
fr. 23: 192; fr. 27: 167; fr. 37: 201
Aristagoras
Mammakuthos: 31
Aristomenes
Dionysos Askētēs: 100
fr. 5: 37
Aristophanes Acharnians
l. 11: 90; ll. 32–33: 123; ll. 32–36: 122, 124; l. 66: 47; ll. 85–86: 116; l. 99: 90; l. 116: 77; l. 159: 47; l. 167: 108; ll. 204–207: 59; ll. 219–222: 59; ll. 303–593: 200; l. 312: 26; ll. 331–336: 233; ll. 366–384: 127; l. 398: 42; l. 400: 90; l. 445: 217; l. 462: 90; ll. 557–571: 214; l. 593: 109; ll. 595–597: 197; ll. 598–619: 197; l. 625: 168; ll. 719–720: 168; l. 873: 184; ll. 880–894: 227; l. 962: 195, 226–227; l. 976: 182; l. 979: 189; l. 980: 184; l. 1069: 92–93; ll.

1085–1093: 72, 174; ll. 1089–1093: 70; ll. 1096–1142: 58; l. 1148: 109; l. 1211: 248
Birds
l. 19: 88, 91; ll. 27–48: 123; l. 36: 103; l. 95: 74; l. 138: 109–110; ll. 268–304: 59; l. 355: 70; l. 445: 141; ll. 472–475: 146; l. 639: 31; l. 745: 186; ll. 848–1057: 115; ll. 904–957: 95; ll. 1102–1117: 141; l. 1108: 46; l. 1281: 66, 89; l. 1282: 31; l. 1284: 66; l. 1342: 41; ll. 1372–1409: 95; l. 1404: 94, 104; l. 1540: 111; ll. 1583–1590: 76
Clouds
ll. 41–55: 123, 125; ll. 43–45: 122; l. 98: 46; l. 153: 180; l. 222: 90; l. 242: 43; ll. 316–318: 179; ll. 331–338: 95; l. 339: 228; l. 346: 69; ll. 518–562: 48, 127; l. 522: 101; l. 529: 111; ll. 700–702: 217; ll. 711–715: 29; l. 734: 134; l. 736: 90; ll. 834–837: 56; l. 860: 26; ll. 889–1114: 108; ll. 973–975: 199; l. 976: 109; l. 979: 109; l. 991: 56; l. 1006: 111; ll. 1044–1046: 56; l. 1075: 138; l. 1078: 63; ll. 1115–1130: 141; l. 1214: 26; l. 1276: 262; l. 1427: 184
Ecclesiazusae
ll. 1–18: 96; l. 143: 189; l. 180: 221; l. 383: 103; ll. 431–434: 123; l. 574: 234; l. 578: 102; ll. 605–606: 69; ll. 689–710: 69; l. 737: 148–149; ll. 834–852: 69, 72; l. 840: 174; l. 844: 71; l. 949: 198; l. 994: 109; l. 1069: 73, 186; ll. 1154–1162: 141 Frogs
l. 21: 26; l. 157: 105; l. 227: 88; l. 309: 239; l. 506: 116; l. 510: 71; ll. 513–516: 73; l. 676: 103; ll. 710–713: 56; l. 740: 88, 91; l. 753: 134; ll. 809–810: 239; ll. 830–1481: 108; l. 859: 244; ll. 895–904: 59; l. 1342: 70
Knights
ll. 24–25: 134; ll. 85–96: 71; l. 88: 258; l. 125: 90; l. 235: 74; l. 238: 78; ll. 242–283: 59; l. 361: 228; l. 580: 273; l. 631: 92; l. 726: 85; l. 732: 109; ll. 805–807: 123; l. 823: 85; ll. 839–840: 105; ll. 885–886: 101–102; l. 1064: 54; ll. 1132–1134: 218; l. 1190: 228; l. 1199: 85; l. 1218: 184; l. 1345: 108; ll. 1366–1367: 47; ll. 1373–1374: 168 Lysistrata
l. 2: 186; ll. 7–8: 91–92; l. 139: 88; l. 556: 168; l. 560: 144; l. 633: 168; l. 707: 91; l. 721: 186; l. 729: 174; l. 860: 239; l. 911: 186; l. 930: 198; l. 998: 186; l. 1050: 46; l. 1097: 97
Peace
l. 32: 43; l. 33: 198; l. 139: 184; l. 174: 54; l. 190: 38; l. 285: 73; ll. 299–338: 59; l. 520: 90; ll. 556–557: 122–123; l. 570: 105; ll. 582–586: 123; l. 645: 46; l. 669: 43; ll. 709–718: 167; l. 741: 76; ll. 828–831: 95; l. 869: 72; l. 875: 193; ll. 922–1126: 69, 115; l. 935: 28; ll. 979–982: 27; ll. 979–986: 24; ll. 1185–1186: 123
Thesmophoriazusae
l. 258: 37; l. 438: 218; ll. 466–519: 200; ll. 476–489: 24; ll. 520–530: 59; l. 555: 198; l. 576: 66; ll. 689–759: 200; l. 735: 219, 234; l. 977: 186
Wasps
l. 75: 80; ll. 79–80: 215; l. 93: 43; l. 338: 141; l. 418: 201; l. 474: 109; l. 495: 196, 203; l. 540: 103; ll. 552–558: 199; l. 606: 47; l. 655: 92; ll. 655–724: 40; ll. 676–677: 70, 174; l. 699: 85; l. 877: 234; ll. 1016–1017: 127; l. 1025: 109; ll. 1043–1059: 127; l. 1044: 127; ll. 1052–1053: 102; ll. 1066–1067: 218; l. 1157: 198; ll. 1216–1222: 73; ll. 1299–1325: 69, 188; l. 1300: 189; ll. 1341–1379: 188; ll. 1341–1387: 136 Wealth
ll. 23–24: 51; l. 87: 154; l. 193: 103; l. 243: 80; l. 379: 46; l. 415: 219; ll. 418–609: 40; l. 515: 96; l. 756: 91–92; ll. 883–885: 82; l. 1055: 64; l. 1190: 182
fr. 30: 40; fr. 102: 26; fr. 109: 125; fr. 148: 155; fr. 187: 36; fr. 197: 201; fr. 198: 77; fr. 260: 189; fr. 278: 141;

fr. 380: 117, 228; fr. 402: 194; fr. 403: 142; fr. 549: 175; fr. 591: 257; fr. 613: 71; fr. 869: 152
Aristopho
Kallonides: 49, 224
Philonides: 48, 223
Plato: 48, 90
fr. 1: 125; fr. 4: 153; fr. 5: 28, 59, 76, 189; fr. 6: 24; fr. 9: 264; fr. 10: 54; fr. 11: 26, 40, 74, 108; fr. 12: 54; fr. 13: 59, 96, 129
Aristotle
Athenian Constitution
8.1: 104; 22.2: 197; 44.4: 197; 61.1: 197; 62.2: 195
De Anima 307^{b}4–5: 216
Ethica Nicomachea
1102b: 32
1129^{b}19–21: 250
Magna Moralia 1182^{a}25–30: 54
Poetica
1449a: 94; 1453^{a}37–39: 14, 174; 1460^{a}27–32: 200
Politica:
1313^{b}32–38: 61; 1342b: 94
Problemata 3.873^{a}22–23: 71
Rhetorica 1409^{a}1: 59
fr. 107: 183–184
Aristoxenus
Harmonica 39–40: 53
Arrian
Anabasis 2.5.4: 63
Artemidorus
Onirocriticon 2.33: 175
Asius
fr. 14.2: 76–77
Astydamas
Alcmeon: 36
Athamas: 20
Athenaeus
Deipnosophistae
1.18c: 57; 2.41d: 58, 60; 2.69c: 135; 3.99f: 120, 183; 3.100b: 184; 3.106a: 120; 3.123d: 60; 4.174f: 98–99; 6.224c–228b: 192, 194; 6.236e: 76; 6.267e–270a: 182; 7.277a: 168; 8.336a: 62; 9.381c–e: 120; 9.385a–c: 75; 9.386e: 75, 78; 10.415a–b: 37; 10.444b: 188; 12.530b–c: 63; 13.558e: 22; 13.565–571a: 151; 13.590d–591f: 158; 13.592c: 25; 13.599d: 207; 14.639b: 68; 14.646f: 72; 14.652b–653b: 255; 15.692a–b: 72
Aulus Gellius
Noctes Atticae 13.11.1–3: 266
Axionicus
fr. 3: 98; fr. 4: 116, 144
Bato
fr. 3: 52; fr. 4: 90, 110; fr. 5: 92, 116, 228; fr. 7: 108
Bion
fr. 7: 78
Callias
fr. 6: 117
Callicrates fr. 1: 155
Callimachus
fr. 478: 135
Catullus
Carmina 5: 65
Chrysippus (Stoicus)
fr. 313: 30; fr. 667: 66
Cicero
Brutus 47: 25
Crates
fr. 2: 176; fr. 17: 182; fr. 22: 202
Cratinus
Pytine: 48
fr. 39: 148; fr. 46: 76; fr. 149: 183–184; fr. 171: 141; fr. 172: 182; fr. 176: 182; fr. 181: 184; fr. 203: 258; fr. 257: 168; fr. 336: 116; fr. 342: 31, 133; fr. 346: 76; fr. 348: 92; fr. 350: 168; fr. 351: 108; fr. 359: 186; fr. 363: 182
Crobylus
fr. 8: 228
Damoxenus
fr. 2: 41, 116, 228
Democritus (Philosophus)
fr. 9: 27
Demosthenes
1.24: 25; 4.3: 55; 4.44: 266; 6.25: 266; 6.30: 258; [7.45]: 135; 8.40: 135; 15.22: 27; 18.16: 27; 18.139: 104; 19.250: 25; 21.13: 104; 21.215: 70; 22.56: 154, 156; 23.61: 25; 24.105: 250; 24.137: 25; 45.6:

198; [50.35]: 56; 57.1: 27; 57.45: 119; [59.122]: 24
Dinarchus
1.53: 26
Dio Cassius
Historiae Romanae 54.27.1: 106; 79.13.2: 37
Diodorus Siculus
4.47: 20; 4.66: 35
Diogenes Laertius
3.26: 88; 8.83: 35–36
Dionysius (Comicus)
fr. 2: 115, 143, 173, 201, 246, 252; fr. 3: 58, 115, 120, 143; fr. 4: 190
Diphilus
Aleiptria: 32
Balaneion: 56
fr. 23: 59; fr. 31: 192; fr. 32: 47, 192, 195; fr. 61: 76; fr. 67: 46–47, 103, 167, 192; fr. 75: 175; fr. 86: 215; fr. 87: 41; fr. 90: 116; fr. 101: 260
Ennius
Athamas: 20
Ephippus
fr. 3: 201; fr. 6: 24; fr. 8: 71; fr. 12: 70, 114, 228; fr. 13: 72; fr. 14: 89; fr. 15: 51, 58, 226–227; fr. 20: 249
Epicharmus
fr. 31: 76; fr. 32: 76; fr. 33: 76; fr. 41: 182; fr. 131: 258; fr. 237: 141
Epicrates
fr. 3: 153; fr. 7: 96; fr. 8: 198, 261; fr. 10: 89
Eubulus
Kubeutai: 160
Nannion: 156
fr. 13: 134; fr. 14: 117; fr. 35: 144; fr. 36: 227; fr. 38: 28, 235; fr. 40: 108; fr. 41: 24; fr. 44: 71; fr. 48: 128–129; fr. 63: 70; fr. 67: 46, 152; fr. 75: 96; fr. 81: 46; fr. 82: 46; fr. 87: 203; fr. 89: 172, 174–175; fr. 93: 188; fr. 97: 243; fr. 115: 24, 40; fr. 136: 71, 129; fr. 137: 206
Euphro
fr. 1: 115, 199; fr. 8: 195; fr. 9: 200
Eupolis
Demoi: 90
Kolakes: 48, 54, 76, 89, 224
Marikas: 48, 86, 224
fr. 32: 130; fr. 96: 82; fr. 99: 80; fr. 117: 28; fr. 156: 203; fr. 157: 92; fr. 160: 195; fr. 175: 76; fr. 176: 29, 72; fr. 187: 76; fr. 190: 77; fr. 192: 36, 141; fr. 221: 215; fr. 315: 182; fr. 338: 168; fr. 355: 144; fr. 392: 127
Euripides
Aeolus: 211
Alcestis
ll. 747–802: 69; ll. 773–860: 238; ll. 794–795: 238
Alcmeon α′ et β′: 36
Andromache
l. 272: 239; l. 680: 142
Bacchae
ll. 278–283: 238; l. 526: 96; l. 731: 60; l. 1276: 136
Electra
l. 904: 221
Eumenides
l. 560: 219
Hecuba
l. 341: 236; ll. 593–594: 244; l. 716: 198; l. 805: 41
Helena
l. 59: 266; ll. 437–439: 266; ll. 1617–1618: 41; l. 1269: 193; l. 1657: 249 Heraclidae
l. 587: 142
Hercules
l. 946: 105
Hippolytus
l. 75: 184; ll. 176–197: 40; ll. 373–390: 40; l. 612: 259; ll. 616–668: 24; l. 750: 78; l. 923: 217; l. 1204: 218; l. 1362: 198
Ino: 20
Ion
l. 251: 43; l. 554: 70
Iphigenia Aulidensis
l. 511: 137; l. 1605: 142; l. 1617: 42
Iphigenia Taurica
l. 684: 78; l. 1029: 102
Medea
ll. 162–163: 198; ll. 214–251: 40; l. 225: 239; ll. 410–430: 24; l. 529: 217; l. 691: 108; ll. 878–879: 265; l. 1284: 142

Orestes
ll. 1–3: 41; l. 232: 220–221; l. 298: 42; l. 804: 70; l. 1155: 41
Phoenissae
ll. 532–534: 154; l. 1670: 77; l. 1763: 142 Supplices
ll. 438–441: 104
Troades
ll. 647–649: 27; l. 1051: 107, 109
fr. 25: 88; fr. 213: 187; fr. 285: 140; fr. 347: 141; fr. 425: 140; fr. 521: 27; fr. 634: 140; fr. 852: 140; fr. 1008: 200; fr. 1028: 140; fr. 1063: 140; [fr. 1113*a*]: 92
Galen
8.691: 234; 14.617: 131
Gorgias
Helena: 25, 28, 64
Palamedes: 64
Hegesander
fr. 1: 248; fr. 2: 92
Hegesippus (Comicus) fr. 2: 52, 217
Heliodorus
Aethiopica
5.29: 188; 10.41.3: 106
Heraclitus
fr. 50: 65; fr. 62: 65
Hermippus
The Birth of Athēna: 100
fr. 6: 30; fr. 37: 69; fr. 48: 29; fr. 63: 70, 114, 255; fr. 68: 56; fr. 73: 262
Herodas
13.3: 249
Herodotus
1.32: 239; 1.52: 183; 1.202: 110; 2.145: 185; 4.39: 27; 6.105–106: 185; 6.125: 35–36; 6.139: 244; 7.18: 60
Hesiod Theogonia
ll. 570–613: 24
Opera et Dies
ll. 54–105: 24; ll. 109–120: 179, 181–182; l. 571: 91
Hipparchus (Comicus) fr. 2: 42
Hippocrates
Aphorismi 6.57: 157
De Flatibus 13: 157
Epidemiae 7.1.9: 32
Prorrheticon 2.19: 157
Hipponax
fr. 26*a*: 70; fr. 36: 153; fr. 114*a*: 137
Homer
Iliad
3.39: 66; 3.182: 78; 4.257–259: 247; 9.554: 217; 15.381–383: 43; 18.317: 200; 18.521: 184; 18.550: 119
[Margites]: 31
Odyssey
1.91–92: 75; 2.50–59: 75; 2.349–350: 71; 3.51: 71; 3.479–480: 168; 4.101: 102; 9.108–111: 179; 9.196–197: 71; 10.519: 71; 20.69: 71; 20.139: 266
Horace Odes 1.11.6–8: 63
Hyginus
Fabulae
1–5: 20; 176–177: 145; 242: 211; 244: 200
Astronomica 2.1: 267
Hyperides
Epitaphius 43: 239
fr. 142: 156; fr. 171: 159
Isocrates
5.123: 78; 6.106: 126; 7.48: 80; 11.3: 27; 11.5: 78; 15.287: 80; 18.42: 55
Laberius
Colorator: 147
Libanius
Declamationes 12.31: 26
Lucian
Alexander 25: 27
Cataplus 13: 26
Dialogi Deorum 10.5: 112
Dialogi Meretricii
4.2: 112; 11.2: 156
Fly's Encomium: 25
Juppiter Tragoedus 41: 60
Necyomantia 5: 92
Pseudologista 24: 131
Symposium or The Lapiths: 188
Timon 54–54: 188
Lucretius
De rerum natura 3.869: 65
Lycurgus Against Leocrates 77: 250

Lynceus
fr. 1: 202
Lysias
7.18: 125; 7.28: 125
fr. 98: 32–33
Macho
fr. 5.44: 248; fr. 16.262–268: 72; fr. 16.315: 248; fr. 18.433: 146; fr. 18.450–455: 47, 159
Magnes
fr. 2: 69
Manilius
Astronomica 2.29: 145; 3.359: 145
Martial
Epigrams 1.85.5–6: 45
Matro
fr. 1: 72–73
Menander
Aspis
l. 113: 142; ll. 153–154: 222; l. 234: 133; l. 432: 220–221
Daktylios: 82
Dyscolus
ll. 57–68: 59; l. 93: 189; ll. 153–154: 26; l. 169: 124; ll. 183–184: 51; l. 192: 73; ll. 209–211: 125; ll. 271–298: 40; l. 481: 200; l. 646: 115; ll. 708–747: 59 Epitrepontes
ll. 136–137: 47; ll. 450–479: 215; l. 472: 71; ll. 878–881: 221; ll. 1087–1099: 40
Georgos
ll. 76–82: 126
Hero
l. 7: 26
Kolax
l. 127: 74; fr. 4: 110
Misumenos
l. 464: 142
Perikeiromene: 82
Samia
ll. 35–36: 215; ll. 74–75: 72; l. 306: 74; ll. 369–398: 24; ll. 508–509: 24
fr. 2: 58, 60; fr. 98: 82; fr. 177: 131; fr. 191: 41; fr. 203: 98; fr. 236: 217; fr. 260: 37; fr. 299: 126; fr. 301: 122; fr. 353: 183; fr. 508: 26; fr. 752: 263–264
Metagenes
Mammakuthos: 31
fr. 4: 73, 110; fr. 6: 182; fr. 18: 168
Mimnermus
fr. 1: 63
Mnesimachus
Alcmeon: 36
fr. 3: 137, 226; fr. 4: 29, 58, 70, 110, 114–116, 143, 228; fr. 7: 187, 248
Naevius
Commotria: 148
Nicochares
fr. 18: 236, 238
Nicomachus
Alcmeon: 36
Nicopho
fr. 10: 29; fr. 21: 182
Nicostratus (Comicus)
Anterōsa: 108
fr. 4: 58, 226; fr. 25: 190; fr. 27: 72
Ophelio
Ialemos: 131
fr. 4: 257
Ovid Metamorphoses
1.689–712: 185; 2.409–514: 145; 4.464–542: 20; 11.146–179: 185; 14.635–641: 185
Tristia 1.1.85–86: 44
Pausanias
1.25.1: 145, 267; 1.44.7–10: 20; 8.3.6–7: 145; 8.24.7–10: 35; 8.36.8: 185; 9.34.7: 20; 10.23.7: 185; 42.2–3: 185; 54.6–7: 185
Pausanias (Grammaticus)
δ 12: 37
Phaedrus
Fabulae Aesopiae 1.18.1: 44
Pherecrates
fr. 22: 135; fr. 43: 257; fr. 84: 102; fr. 102: 141; fr. 149: 175; fr. 155: 95; fr. 158: 244; fr. 163: 54
Philemo
Daktylios: 82
fr. 3: 134, 138; fr. 40: 58; fr. 45: 101, 108, 176; fr. 65: 198; fr. 74: 52, 123; fr. 130: 101, 176; fr. 158: 71; fr. 165: 64; fr. 178: 42, 59

Philetaerus Kynagis: 152
fr. 2: 80; fr. 6: 63; fr. 7: 40, 63, 139; fr. 9: 52, 59, 155; fr. 13: 63, 139–140, 227
Philippides
fr. 5: 153, 200; fr. 6: 51, 63; fr. 19: 243; fr. 23: 46
Philiscus
The Birth of Pan: 185
Philonides
fr. 7: 260
Philonides II
fr. 2: 263–264
Philyllius
fr. 20: 92; fr. 26: 92; fr. 32: 60
Phocylides
fr. 7: 122
Phoenicides
fr. 2: 255
Photius
Bibliotheca 530*a*: 148
π 417.11: 37
Phrynichus (Atticista)
Praeparatio Sophistica 30.3: 156
Phrynichus (Comicus)
Monotropos: 131
fr. 24: 76; fr. 64: 239; fr. 69: 266; fr. 74: 258
Pindar
Nemean
2.19: 86; 5.18: 264
Pythian 8.41–47: 35
fr. 95: 185; fr. 203: 31
Plato (Comicus)
Cleophon: 48, 223
Hyperbolus: 48
Mammakuthoi: 31
Perialges: 131
fr. 23: 105; fr. 71: 72–73; fr. 138: 157; fr. 188: 43; fr. 189: 142; fr. 201: 197
Plato (Philosophus) Alcibiades i
104d: 112; 127d: 43; 132a: 109
Apologia
28b: 26
Cratylus
408b–d: 185
Euthydemus
272b: 42
Gorgias
497a: 30
Laches
184a: 106
Leges
636c: 136; 700d–e: 95; 704d: 42; 783e: 54; 806a: 137; 815c: 185; 837b–c: 110; 896c: 235; 935e: 90
Lysis 204e: 218
Menexenus
237d: 184; 247c: 42
Phaedo
100c: 92; 263d: 185; 279b: 185
Phaedrus
240d: 42; 241d: 70
Politicus
259d: 54; 268b: 42; 270b: 27
Protagoras
332a: 222; 346b: 42
Respublica
372c: 71; 373a: 73; 397a: 95; 414c: 27; 476e: 42; 493d: 69
Sophista
218b: 32
Symposion
175a: 266; 176e: 73; 182d: 110; 183d: 110; 184d: 137; 203c–d: 111; 210b: 222; 223a: 77
Theaetetus
149a: 26
(lost) lecture On the Good: 49, 53–54
Plautus
Bacchides
69–73: 248; 284–285: 86
Condalium: 82
Plutarch
Moralia
13f: 23; 78a: 108; 127e–131d: 56; 139c: 27; 419b–c: 185; 656c–e: 188; 667f: 168; 769b: 66; 818b: 103; 865b: 26
Aristides
8.3: 104
Pericles
9: 86; 11.5: 254
Romulus
5.2: 266; 28.7: 258

Sertorius
17.8: 262
Solon
27.5: 210; 28.3: 60
Themistocles
29.11: 168
Theseus
35.2: 137
Poliochus
fr. 2: 92
Pollux
2.32: 148; 2.49: 92; 3.44: 136; 3.111: 205–206; 3.154: 32; 4.76: 98–99; 6.104–107: 72; 7.26: 168; 7.204: 79; 9.94: 79; 10.140: 148
Polybius
10.33.3: 27
Pomponius
Aleones: 160
Anulus: 82
Posidippus
fr. 1: 115; fr. 10: 130; fr. 13: 159; fr. 28: 115
Rufus
Quaestiones Medicinales 10: 157
Sappho
fr. 94: 176
Semonides
fr. 1: 184; fr. 7: 24
Simplicius
In Aristotelis Physica Commentaria: 53
Solon
Laws fr. 111: 249
fr. 38: 70; fr. 39: 70; fr. 40: 70
Sopater
Fakē: 255
fr. 1: 252; fr. 18: 227; fr. 22: 252; fr. 24: 252
Sophilus
fr. 1: 58; fr. 2: 192; fr. 5: 58, 60; fr. 6: 77; fr. 7: 183; fr. 8: 77
Sophocles
Ajax
l. 56: 116; l. 75: 265; l. 145: 184; l. 231: 184; l. 293: 264; l. 299: 116; l. 324: 184; ll. 485–486: 41; l. 803: 137; ll. 1082–1083: 246, 249
Alcmeon: 36
Antigone
l. 329: 77; l. 702: 41; l. 935: 42
Athamas α′ et β′: 20
Electra
l. 48: 137; l. 130: 42; l. 1115: 70
Oedipus Coloneus
l. 418: 26; l. 1211: 140; l. 1214: 141
Oedipus Tyrannus
ll. 22–24: 43; l. 1345: 198
Philoctetes
l. 1316: 142; l. 1317: 137
Trachiniae
ll. 272–273: 43; ll. 1046–1047: 219; l. 1183: 265
fr. 4: 20; fr. 268: 188; fr. 758: 238; fr. 811: 260; fr. 945: 88
Sosipater
fr. 1: 246
Strabo
8.6.20: 34; 14.5.9: 63
Strato
fr. 1: 101, 176
Strattis
fr. 29: 203; fr. 34: 175; fr. 41: 137
Teleclides
fr. 1: 182
Theocritus
Idylls
1.123–130: 185; 7.106–108: 185; 15.78–80: 119; 25: 123
Theodectes
Alcmeon: 36
Theognetus
fr. 2: 190
Theognis
l. 351: 157; ll. 401–402: 222; ll. 479–487: 187; ll. 500–510: 187; l. 954: 137; l. 1000: 184
Theophilus
fr. 6: 134; fr. 11: 24, 52, 152, 156; fr. 12: 24, 47, 63, 108, 154
Theophrastus
Characteres
3.2: 227; 8.12: 205–206; 21.10: 175; 24.8: 199
De Causis Plantarum
2.4.8: 38; 3.14–15: 38; 4.9.1: 183–184
De Odoribus
42: 175; 55: 175

Historia Plantarum
3.16.4: 240, 244
Theopompus (Comicus)
fr. 31: 46; fr. 39: 182; fr. 41: 129; fr. 63: 80; fr. 68: 240, 244
Thucydides
1.102.3: 218; 2.38.2: 253; 2.43.1: 109; 2.102.5: 35; 4.26.5: 69; 4.84–88: 232; 5.9.6: 216; 6.4.3: 254; 6.54.6–7: 74; 7.82: 262
Timocles
Balaneion: 56
Daktylios: 82
Dēlos: 164
Orestautokleides: 155
fr. 6: 36; fr. 8: 76; fr. 11: 203; fr. 16: 152; fr. 22: 129; fr. 25: 24, 47, 152; fr. 27: 70, 155–156
Timostratus
Pan: 185
Timotheus (Lyricus)
fr. 796: 95
Timotheus (Tragicus)
Alcmeon: 36
Virgilius
Georgica 1.17: 185; 3.391–3: 185
Xenarchus
fr. 1: 96; fr. 4: 152, 155; fr. 6: 260; fr. 7: 41, 192, 239
Xenocles
Athamas: 20
Xenophon
Cyropaedia
1.2.15: 130; 1.4.15: 104; 6.1.26: 103
Hellenica
4.2.21: 216; 4.4.15: 27; 4.8.22: 216; 5.4: 113
Memorabilia
1.4.3: 95; 3.11.1–18: 47; 4.1.1: 64
Oeconomicus
7.30: 27
[Respublica Atheniensium]
2.7: 253
Respublica Lacedaemoniorum
3.4: 32
Symposion
2.1–2: 73; 2.23: 129; 2.24: 238; 8.22: 111; 9.2: 64

4. Index rerum et nominum notabiliorum

Ashurbanipal: 62–63, 139
Callisto: 145–146, 177, 267–268, 270
Canis Maior (Constellation myth): 14, 177–178, 268–270
Cooks: 102, 114–115, 143, 173, 200, 246–249, 252
Dice / Dicing: 80–81, 160–161
Dithyramb / (para)dithyrambic style: 94–100, 102, 104, 131
Dramatic illusion (break of): 141
Encomia (paradoxical): 25
Eros: 26, 40, 107–111
Fish: 41, 46–47, 110, 114–118, 143–144, 164–169, 192, 195–196, 203, 225–229
Fishmongers: 41, 47, 93, 152, 166–167, 171, 191–198, 200, 203
Food / food-catalogues: 114–117, 139, 144, 165–168, 181–184, 186–188, 194–195
Generals (Institution of Ten Generals): 93, 191, 194, 197–198
Hetairai: 11, 15, 21–28, 33–34, 46–47, 50, 52, 56, 66–67, 70, 73, 121, 148, 151–159, 167, 194, 200, 260–261
Homosexuality: 107, 109, 208
Indulgence (in pleasures): 56, 62–64, 67, 80, 91, 139, 160, 183, 214
Knowledge (skill): 16, 38–40, 42–44
Lyca (hetaira): 15, 148, 150, 152, 155–157, 159
Misfortune (ill-luck): 16, 38–40, 42–44, 126, 238
Myth (in Comedy): 14–15, 20–21, 35, 66–67, 113, 131–132, 146, 165, 170–171, 173, 178–180, 183, 185, 210, 270
Nannion (hetaira): 15, 148, 150, 152–153, 155–157, 159

Obscenity (obscene language): 134, 137–138
Odysseus: 75, 170–171, 173–174, 265
Paradox: 22–23, 25, 28, 63–65, 153, 157
Personification: 16, 25, 40, 42, 85, 95–97, 125, 131, 151–152, 154, 177, 214, 217, 233 Philosophy / philosophers: 11, 15, 36, 48–54, 86–93, 107–108, 179–180, 188, 212, 216–217 exercise of fake/quasi-philosophy: 40–44, 124, 139–140, 221, 237, 260 Phrynē (hetaira): 11, 15, 47, 148, 152–153, 155–156, 158–159, 167
Plato (the philosopher): 11, 15, 30, 32, 48–54, 86–92, 95, 107–108, 110–111, 148, 216
Poverty: 40, 111, 121–122, 124–127, 157, 205
Sea (imagery): 40, 42–43
Sinopē (hetaira): 15, 148, 150, 152, 154–157, 159
Slaves: 50–53, 58–60, 68, 119, 128, 134, 172–176, 186, 188, 204–205, 221, 226, 237, 265
Symposion / sympotic context: 12, 64, 67–69, 71–75, 81, 100, 114, 117, 123, 128, 158, 166, 172, 174–175, 187–188, 212, 231, 240, 245, 247–248, 252, 255, 265–266
Telephus: 191, 200
Ursa Maior (Constellation myth): 14, 145, 267, 270
Utopias (comic): 15, 69, 179–184, 242, 262–263
Wine: 63–64, 67–68, 70–72, 101, 128–129, 139, 144, 147, 168, 182, 186–189, 211–216, 218, 230–235, 237–239, 245, 250–251, 255–258, 261–262
Wives: 20–24, 27–28, 61, 136
Women: 22–24, 27–28, 37, 40, 52, 61, 66–69, 73–74, 79, 82, 102, 119, 121, 149–151, 156–157, 243, 260, 264, 272